Editorial

This reference journal is published once a year and represents - in English language – most new publications in the field of cultural/social anthropology published in the German language area (Austria, Germany, Switzerland). Since many of these publications have been written in German, and most of these publications in the field of anthropology are not included in major, English language abstracting services, Anthropological Abstracts (AA) offers an opportunity and convenient source of information for scholars who do not read German, to become aware of socio-cultural anthropological research and publications in German-speaking countries. Included are journal articles, monographs, edited volumes, exhibition catalogs, yearbooks, etc. Occasionally, publications in English, or French, are included as well if the publisher is less well-known internationally and if it is likely that such publications will not be noticed abroad.

Additionally, a printed version of Anthropological Abstracts is published with Lit Publishers, Muenster, Germany.

Some technical remarks

This reference journal uses a flexible approach: While publications are represented in the form of abstracts in most cases, for edited volumes the Current Contents method is applied, i.e. only authors and titles appear. So technically, this is a combined approach of an Abstracting Reference Journal and the Current Contents method of listing names and titles only.

Abstracts supplied by authors are marked by ## before and after the abstract. Due to space limitations they may be abbreviated. Up to three editors of an anthology will be listed; if there are more, only the first will appear (added by ,et al.').

Only those papers in journals will be abstracted that are relevant to cultural/social anthropology - which mainly applies in the case of interdisciplinary, or predominantly sociological journals. AA also tries to cover subjects related to, or influencing, anthropology, i.e. if texts are relevant for present discourses. Thus, there may be material from history, folklore studies, linguistics, sociology, philosophy, etc., if there is an intersection with present debates in anthropology.

Keywords serve as an "abstract of the abstract" - for a quick assessment of the contents. Page numbers in the Subject Index refer to the page where the Keywords listings appear.

The Subject Index – consisting of the Keywords of abstracts in alphabetical order – do not follow the Thesaurus principle but are chosen rather loosely and generously, according to need, and there is no strict formal rule or ‚normalization‘ to limit their number. In many cases, Subject Index terms try to be specific rather than general, in order to reduce the time of searching. Thus, if there is a topic relating to ‚history‘, it will be specified: like ‚history (Guinea)‘, or ‚history and literacy‘, so that users do not have to check all ‚history‘ entries.

Regarding alphabetical order, the German Umlaut (ä, ö, ü) will be broken up into ae, oe, ue in the text, but is disregarded in the indexes.

The publishers, museums and research institutions must be thanked for their generally prompt deliveries of the books requested for Anthropological Abstracts.

Technology and Cultural (R)evolution: Can E-Health and Telemedicine Give Power to the Patients?

Curare 34.2011:165-172

Keywords: doctor-patient relationship, e-health, telemedicine, power and empowerment, empowerment (patients), partnership technology, medical anthropology

##In medicine, technology may on the one hand support certain economic and political structures, such as dependency of remote local health centers on large clinics in cities. On the other hand, telemedicine and e-health as tools of increasing the circulation of knowledge and information have the opposite effect on the level of the doctor-patient relationship. Thus, they can empower the patients by democratizing knowledge that used to be exclusive to doctors, by forming strong social online networks and by enabling patients to be more involved in communication and decision making with regards to their health and treatment.##

Orte der Diversität. Formate, Arrangements und Inszenierungen

Bielefeld: VS Verlag 2011

245 pp., Euro 29.95; ISBN 3-531-17499-0

Keywords: diversity, urban diversity, cyber diversity, „management“ of diversity, diversity mainstreaming, minorities, majority, ethnicity, gender, civil society

Locations of diversity. Formats, arrangements, and performances

Thirteen papers of scholars of various fields discuss the topic in specific cases, and conceptually. The editors plead for interrelating discourses of various disciplines, foster interdisciplinary exchange, and focus on interdisciplinary approaches. They follow discourses of civil society. The book is based on a symposium at the Center for Diversity Studies at Cologne, Germany, in 2009.

##This book reflects the intellectual encounter, over the years, between on the one hand, a group of Dutch scholars studying the Ancient Mediterranean, Ancient Egypt and Africa, and, on the other hand, Martin Gardiner Bernal as one of the most challenging and innovative, but also controversial and criticised, scholars of recent decades. In the 1980s, Bernal delivered his first statements on his Black Athena thesis, vocally claiming with new arguments and a new style of presentation, what the specialists had realised for almost a century: that the roots of western civilisation were to be sought not in Ancient Greece but outside Europe, in Ancient Egypt and Mesopotamia (and perhaps ultimately in sub-Saharan Africa).

In the 1987 first volume of Black Athena (initially planned to be a tetralogy) Bernal's leading question was not so much 'what really happened in the formative millennia of European proto-history', but rather: 'what processes in the course of two and a half millennia of European intellectual history have made us forget our essential indebtedness to "the Afroasiatic roots of classical civilisation"?'##

##Intangible Cultural Heritage as Peacemaker

This contribution discusses the prospects and challenges arising out of a declaration of so-called traditional justice mechanisms as internationally recognised intangible cultural heritage. For long, internationally sponsored post-conflict reconstruction was mainly concerned with the rebuilding of tangible cultural heritage that had been damaged or destroyed during conflict. In contrast, the impact of mass violence on intangible cultural aspects such as social structures, traditional justice mechanisms and values is often ignored due to their invisibility to outsiders, the enormous amount of time needed to rebuild them and the lack of knowledge on how to facilitate this process. This has disastrous effects on post-conflict-situations, especially in cases of neighbours fighting neighbours rather than the state fighting its citizens, which makes conflict resolution and reconciliation even more difficult. However, in places such as Rwanda, East Timor and the Moluccas (Indonesia) it was the re-establishment of broken social relationships of the people concerned that brought reconciliation and sustainable peace.##

Interkulturelle Kommunikation. Missverständnisse – Verständigung

Wiesbaden: VS Verlag 2011

Keywords: communication, intercultural communication, alterity and understanding, understanding alterity, cultural sciences

Intercultural communication. Misunderstandings – understanding

The author discusses difficulties of communication/understanding between cultures in central-European settings, i.e. from a western-sociological perspective. She names examples such as: ‚insider‘ language, gestures, different conceptions/apprehensions of time. These culture-specific codes tend to make communication difficult – resulting in social and economic effects, conflict, or culture shock. Therefore, the author argues, professional help in the form of ‚intercultural competence‘ and ‚intercultural conflict solution‘ is required. Perceiving alterity, changes with global developments/processes she argues as a cultural scientist, and notions such as hybrid cultures, transculturality, multiculturalism refer to these new frames of relating culturally.

##Our Shared Cultural Property: An Anthropological Approach to UNESCO World Heritage

UNESCO’s „World Heritage“ designation has become a globally observed, coveted distinction that strongly influences public ideas about culture. The article reports on multi-sited field research in the complex and contested arena formed by the world Heritage committee, the UNESCO convention secretariat, several expert NGOs and the state representatives. This arena is dominated by written materials, and access to it is subject to certain restrictions, yet ethnographic research proves no less rewarding here than in other, less formal contexts. In response to accusations of Eurocentrism, the designation process has in recent years shifted to everyday heritage, new categories such as cultural landscapes, a broadening of authenticity standards, and concept-driven nominations. European dominance persists, however, and has provoked a North-south conflict in which leading states of the South increasingly challenge advice received from the mostly Euroamerican experts. This reproduces tendencies found in other global regimes, such as that for climate control, and demonstrates the limits of multilateralism in a world that continues to be structured by nation states.##

Vergleichen? Komparatistische Wissenschaften im Vergleich

Keywords: comparative sciences, comparison, interdisciplinary comparison

Comparing? Comparing comparativist sciences

Contributions of 15 authors of various disciplines report, from their respective viewpoints, on comparison, and this – so the editors – represents a panoramic meta-comparison. Possibilities, problems and limits of comparatist methods are described. The editors conclude: It will be important to clearly define the respective function of a comparison or to recognize it if it is an interpretation of a comparison. Objects may show similarities, because there are causal connections between them, or because they emerge from comparable contexts. But analogies can be contingent and meaningless also. Those people comparing should be clear about the purpose why things are seen in relation. There is the normative, convergent, the contrastive and that descriptive comparison. All of them have, depending on the context and cognitive interest, various functions. Those researchers focusing continuities and developments will concentrate on convergent traits, those looking for crises and breaks will enhance contrasts and so on. The idea of a really neutral unperspective comparison is probably obsolete.

Intersektionalität als Beitrag zu einer gesellschaftstheoretisch informierten Ungleichheitsforschung

Berliner Journal für Soziologie 21.2011:69-90

Keywords: intersectionality, inequality, class, gender, body

##Discussing the theoretical linkage between intersectionality, social theory and social inequality

The following article argues that an in-depth analysis of different living conditions requires a theoretical and empirical perspective which does not only take into account class but also other categories of social inequality such as gender, race and body. Departing from the idea that these categories are mutually intertwined, the article suggests an intersectional multi-layered approach which allows to examine reciprocal effects between class, gender, race and body on three different levels: the level of social structures, the level of identity construction and the level of symbolic representation. Considering the theoretical relationship between the analysis of class and social inequality, the article also intends to understand and explain how these different levels of analysis are interrelated, how the linkage between social categories and levels of social reality have to be methodologically reflected and how they can be made accessible in and through empirical research.##

##Transpacific cultural encounters: Perspectives on appropriation processes and migration experiences

This article brings together theoretical approaches to the study of appropriation, transculturalism and migration to explore contemporary Latin American migrant experiences and social positioning in Aotearoa New Zealand. I argue that migrants' experiences are mediated by New Zealand migration politics and the country's official definition as a bicultural nation. Simultaneously, they are also shaped by migrants' individual aspirations and social conditions. Drawing on fieldwork, I trace out the various ways individuals add meaning to their new life circumstances and create successful migration biographies. I argue that individual coping strategies such as appropriation, adaptation or cultural withdrawal are ambiguous and sometimes contested, depending on the viewpoints and social relations of the individuals involved.##

Autonome Technik als Herausforderung der soziologischen Handlungstheorie

Zeitschrift für Soziologie 40.2011:91-111

Keywords: action theory, technology and action theory, Latour, B., autonomous technology, ANT, agent-based modelling

##Autonomous Technology as a Challenge to the Sociological Theory of Action

The following paper sketches a sociological model which describes the "coaction" of technology in a way that allows an empirical investigation of the question of non-human agency. Bruno Latour's provocative arguments are taken as a starting point to show that a sociological theory of action, based on Hartmut Esser's model of sociological explanation, is able to cope with these questions. In order to describe the interaction of human actors and non-human agents, we have, consequently, constructed a sociological model to explain hybrid systems. A car-driving experiment which humans have to cooperate with computer-simulated driver assistant systems has been chosen to prove the potential of the model. The data show that human test persons indeed attribute agency to the technical systems. Additionally, they describe the relation of human and machine as symmetrical. Finally, we have discovered that test persons also tend to attribute responsibility for the achievement of certain objectives to the technical system - although the rules of the game distribute responsibility equally between humans and non-humans.##

From the Amazon to the Eastern Front. The expedition traveller and geographer Otto Schulz-Kampfhenkel (1910-1989)

Zoologist and geographer Schulz-Kampfhenkel undertook expeditions to Africa and the Amazon in the 1930s which he quite effectively circulated, in the media and politically, in the Third Reich, and he was made the „South America expert“ of the regime. He declared his aim to conquer the last „white spots“ on earth for Germany, and in secret military operations he went to the frontlines of World War II to do geographical research for the Nazis. In the book, historians, anthropologists, zoologists and media scientists analyze this „bizarre“ person and his career in the areas of scholarship, the media, politics, and military.

Keywords: traveling, otherness, alterity, ars apodemica, appropriation of alterity, cultural encounters

Meetings. A critical homage to traveling

Frank discusses the journey – phenomenon and myth, that is, traveling as counter-worlds, the relations and interactions of culture/space and borders or delimitations in this context. This is followed by a „short history“ of experiencing the world – early cosmopolitans, appropriating otherness in Early Modernity, the art of traveling (ars apodemica). Then, the focus is on the traveller: self and alterity, ethnocentrism and exotism, and how he/she appropriates „the world“, and even the „postmodern search for the self“. The third part of the book is devoted to global dimensions of encounter – those being visited, whether it is imperialism, destruction of cultures, commercialization of culture, the re-animation of traditions, and strengthening of cultural identity: each of these topics exemplified in the work of one (anthropological) author dealing with the respective problem. In a final contemplation Frank deals with chances and limits of approaching the other, „marginal man and culture broker“.

The cancer of corporations. With contributions by Hans Peter Aubauer et al.

##The main thesis of this work should not only identify an analytical isomorphism between the growth of corporations and cancer (the way it metastasizes in living organisms), but also prove this empirically. Experience with evolutionary epistemology serves as a basis, which shows that substantial regularities already exist in subjacent layers of evolution... Implementing the Dynamic Energy Budget Theory (DEB) of Kooijman (2000), van Leeuwen et al. (2003) developed a tumor model which focuses especially on the tumor-host interaction. It shows that the tumor promotes this growth – analogous to corporations – by reducing growth- and maintenance costs (in comparison to the host). These externalization processes are mainly responsible for the growth of corporate structures... It is demonstrated that there exists not only a qualitative-analytic but also an empirically provable analogy between the growth of corporations and malignant tumors.##

##The concept of Appropriation in Qualitative Reception Studies. A Specification informed by the Sociology of Knowledge with Respect to Cultural Studies Approaches

This paper discusses the currently very popular concept of appropriation in (especially German) media audience studies, which is being developed by cultural studies and focuses on the creativity and self-will of spectators. Despite the fact that cultural studies researchers have, in this way, accomplished pioneering work in terms of qualitative reception studies, there have been tendencies to romanticize and idealize audience activity.

In contrast to such (post-structuralistic and interactionistic) positions and in continuation of approaches in cultural studies which conceptualize appropriation as a specific practice of reception this article proposes a specification inspired by the sociology of knowledge and by the author's empirical findings. This leads to a differentiation of productive vs. reproductive appropriation that is able to further illuminate Stuart Hall's reading-triad: dominant; negotiated; oppositional.##

Anthropology and ethnology at Leipzig in the late 1920s. The first meeting of the Association of Ethnology and expeditions of the Saxon Research Institute

##The article describes the relationship between physical anthropology and ethnology in Germany in the years prior to 1933, with a particular focus on Leipzig. It was here that the first conference of the Association of Ethnology in 1929, organized by Fritz Krause, took place. Among the topics discussed at the conference was the role of physical anthropology in relation to anthropological studies. Leipzig was also the home of the Saxon Research Institute, which provided funds for several ethnological expeditions. Physical anthropology - which at that time often meant 'racial science' - was included in field studies as well as in writing. This will be explored further by discussing the expeditions of Egon Freiherr von Eickstedt, Paul Germann, Joachim Hellmut Wilhelm, Bernhard Struck and Erich Bauer. To investigate the relevance of relations between physical anthropology and ethnology in the past is of historical interest, but it is also important for current discussions about the cooperation between these two disciplines.##

Emergence. Analyzing and explaining complex structures

The editors, sociologists, frame the notion of emergence as the „appearance of traits of a structure whose elements do not show those traits“. As an example, they name the V shape of a flock of flying birds, based on neuronal processes which do not possess consciousness, and they refer to the „social world“, e.g. groups or societies. Frequently, according to the editors, there is the claim that emergent traits of complex structures cannot be traced back („reduced“) to traits of their elements which would necessitate other explanations. This would contradict the claim for a near-complete explanation of reality, however. Papers in this volume are by philosophers, sociologists, neuro-scientists, biologists, and physicists.

Fear and fascination. A new assessment of Franz Anton Mesmer's animal magnetism

This is a brief study is another attempt to understand and categorize Mesmer, including a medical-anthropological perspective. Gruber does so by first referring to, and utilizing Thomas Kuhn's frame of paradigmatic change – by understanding Mesmer as one such case, which becomes clear from his biography. She then describes useful contexts, such as intellectual currents of his time, political and ecclesiastical history, and the history of science. Mesmer's life is another context included, then in detail, theories and concepts of scientific controversy, and a last chapter deals with effects of Mesmer's method of animal magnetism – in relation to scholarly debate, modern research of „life energy“, psychology, music, literature, and philosophy.

Antinomien kultureller Aneignung: Einführung

Zeitschrift für Ethnologie 136.2011:11-26

Keywords: cultural appropriation, appropriation of culture, hybridization, creolization, domestication, globalization

##Antinomies of cultural appropriation - Introduction

In the context of globalization, cultural anthropology gained a new momentum by highlighting the self-conscious persistence of cultural differences. Against the background of an ever increasing intensity of societal and economic entanglements, the vital claim of cultural differences must be a reflexive process associated with the idea that one's own culture is creative and adaptive to innovations. Anthropologists have defined a set of tools in order to describe these processes of cultural changes. These tools have the names of hybridization, creolization and domestication, but, in particular also of cultural appropriation. Historically cultural appropriation was mainly relevant in contexts of unequal power relations. Appropriation thereby became a strategy of the powerless, who used appropriation in order to undermine the structures defined by the powerful. Cultural appropriation can also be practised through mimesis, and thereby negates the authority of powerful actors. Cultural appropriation requires moments of negotiations and does not aim at definitive results, but merely at the transgression of boundaries. Well defined fields of cultural appropriation within anthropology are media studies and consumption. Empirical approaches to a more detailed documentation of appropriation can be the following: (1) Naming, (2) Contextualization, (3) Incorporation and (4) material transformation.##

Doubts considering the „Frankfurt Declaration“ on ethics in anthropology

##The "Frankfurter Declaration" on ethics in cultural anthropology has been voted for by an 'overwhelming majority' at a meeting of the members of the "Deutsche Gesellschaft für Völkerkunde (DGV)", which took place in October 2009 in Frankfurt am Main. The author, who has a few criticisms of the "Declaration", belonged to the minority of those present at the meeting who voted against it. The reasons for his opposition, which will be explained in detail in the article, are the following: (1) On the one hand the authors of the "Declaration" want to make it non-binding by stressing that the planning and carrying out of anthropological research are principally matters for individual responsibility. (2) On the other hand, all those members who voted for the "Declaration" are obliged to profess that individual dignity and responsibility take priority over collective interests. This expressly assumes an image of humanity which is very limited looked at cross-culturally because the individual is privileged as the main criterion of ethically motivated decisions. No reason is given for this Eurocentric attitude in a declaration by cultural anthropologists. (1) To propose basic standards for ethically acceptable behaviour in doing ethnographic fieldwork and in publishing the information obtained in a declaration on ethics in cultural anthropology is, of course, welcome. But the assertion that these standards will unavoidably lead into contradictions and the impossibility of resolving this dilemma makes no sense. It can also be questioned whether these basic standards will prove compatible with the theory of cultural relativism.##

Anthropology. An introduction

This introduction to socio-cultural anthropology with a bent for cultural studies ranges from early evolutionism to cyber anthropology and is designed as a basic textbook suitable for student learning also, including sections with questions and answers. The book thus introduces major branches or subject areas of anthropology, such as globalization, transnationalism, anthropologies of the body and medicine, the senses and emotions, media, the visual. Therefore, Heidemann starts with two fundamental concepts: culture, and methods (field work and participant observation). The first hundred years cover evolutionism, diffusionism, cultural relativism, the culture and personality school, functionalism, structural functionalism, structuralism, and cognitive studies. The more recent part covers the crisis of representation, the interpretive turn, postmodernism, and postcolonial studies. Then, systematic areas are introduced: kinship, economic anthropology, religious studies, political anthropology. The last chapter deals with ethnicity and migration, transnationalism, urban anthropology, medicine and related subjects, and media and cyber anthropology.

Kölner Zeitschrift für Soziologie und Sozialpsychologie 63.2011:359-394

Keywords: sports, globalization, competitive sports

##What makes globalization possible? Explaining the emergence of global horizons of comparison in science and sports

The article conceives of globalization as a highly improbable phenomenon. In contrast to the mainstream of the globalization literature, we ask under which conditions the globalization of societal fields can potentially become an empirical reality. We proceed in three steps: The second part presents an explanatory model that identifies the conditions under which global horizons of comparison may emerge. Our model is predicated on the assumption that the globalization of societal fields is enabled not only by relational linkages (“ties”) but by public comparative discourses (“cultural linkages”) too. In the third part, we apply this model on the development of modern science and competitive sports, proving the explanatory power of our model and showing that in both cases global horizons of comparison first consolidated in the late 19th century. The final part concludes with reflections on commonalities and differences between the two cases, on the applicability of the model to other social fields (e.g. economy) and on its implications for the analysis of globalization processes.##

Fetishes of consumerism. Studies on the sociology of brands

Citing Karl Marx, the author starts by referring to the insight that products, as soon as they are introduced to the market, undergo change. The product becomes a fetish, full of metaphysical sophistication and theological peculiarities. Seen from this perspective, present-day consumer society attributes fetish characteristics to brands. Whether it is Coca Cola or the iPhone – certain brands emanate strong fascination, they seem to have a special aura, drawing people as soon they find them attractive. So the author argues that brands have become fetishes of consumerism. The chapters of the book deal with functions and effects brands have for consumers from a sociological perspective: the function of marketing to mobilize customers, the advertisement value of brands, values of brands, the magic of brands, varieties of consumers, and distinction and consumerism. Finally, a case of protest – an anti-Christmas movement is discussed.

Starting point of the 21 contributions in this volume by various specialists as well as politicians are processes of (neoliberal) globalization penetrating and influencing all areas of life. This is done in the case of the crisis of the European Union, the theory of democracy and the state, the globalization of war, but also discussing perspectives of (leftist) political movements, and questions resulting from these inquiries for political education. This also touches the problem of poverty in an affluent society – especially the aspect of poverty of children with and without migratory background. Other topics are migration and integration, ethnization of social conflicts, and the increase of extreme rightist ideologies. The authors also define necessities for preventing those rightist ideologies. In doing so, the editors understand this volume as a „measurement, or survey of the social world“.

Then, notions and concepts are presented. Herbrik portrays positions of the sociology of knowledge regarding „communication“, as well as the imaginary and imagination in the cultural and social sciences, in anthropology, also using game theory in this context. The next chapter presents data generation and interpretation, followed by describing specific communicative patterns of action pertaining to dealing with the imaginary. The last chapter discusses the results and their implications and scope.

##Religion and religiousness as determinants of homonegativity. A multi-level analysis of 79 countries

Although the attitudes towards homosexuality have become more liberal especially in industrialized Western countries, there is still a huge variance in terms of the levels of homo-negativity worldwide. This article seeks to explain this variance by means of a multi-level-analysis of 79 countries. The data stem from the last two waves of the World Values Survey. On the basis of this data, the article focuses on the power of the religious denomination of a person and her religiousness in order to explain her attitude towards homosexuality; for both variables a strong influence can be detected. In addition, the article indicates that, on the individual level, socio-demographic variables e.g. age, gender, education, marital status or profession are highly interconnected with the intensity of homonegativity. On the country-level, however, the main explanatory factors are both the economic development and the communist heritage. The article further highlights significant conditional relationships by introducing cross-level interactions and interaction terms on the individual level. The final model explains about 60% of the variance on the aggregate level and 30% on the individual level.##

Status and communication. Comparing speech acts in university e-mails and counseling sessions/consultations

The author asks whether in the style of institutional, hierarchically marked e-mails status difference is evident or not – since private e-mail communication tends to be close to spoken language. Based on speech act analysis an inventory of types of speech acts for teachers and students has been generated focusing on communication regarding exams. This allows for reconstruction of their performance, and to interpret it according to parameters of institution, roles, and situations. The study shows that the medium offers various spaces for insinuating and pointing to role and status, that hierarchies are NOT overcome, and that specifically students affirm their own and their teachers' status continuously.

Cyber-anthropology

Knorr assesses cyber-anthropology from the notion of culture as a starting point – using his „pragmatic“ framing of culture to include in it all human thought and artifact, beyond purely biological processes and reproduction and, i.e., innovation (14). And this, consequently, includes all forms of communities, all cultures and countries, not just „oral“ ones – and hence, cyber products and forms of community. Having specified meaning in this way, Knorr considers for instance cyber punk as „one, or the major source of fictional material“ for understanding contemporary life worlds, contemporary culture (29). In continuing his „encyclopaedic“ and essayistic portrait of cyber-anthropology Knorr deals with cybernetics, cyberpunk, spaces of game/play, hardware aspects, completed by a mediography. Knorr reports about his long ethnographic fieldwork among the „Max Payne“ game online scene (MPHQ), and he describes and interprets it anthropologically. Thus, users of this complex interact online but import information and contents of their various „real“ lifeworlds, e.g., nation states, and Knorr makes conclusions based on his participation and observation of these processes. In the chapter on hardware Knorr discusses modding practices comparatively (Sudan, Japan...).

##Beyond the paradigm of secularization?—A discussion with Charles Taylor

Charles Taylor's book A Secular Age is a widely appraised alternative to the classical paradigm of secularization theory. This article situates this alternative theory within the debate of sociology of religion on secularization and its sub-components. Three requirements are formulated that alternative conceptions would have to meet. First, they need to understand why „secularity“ became such a prominent category of self interpretation in modern societies. Second, they have to be able to integrate years of cumulative sociological research on sub-processes of secularization with findings on genuinely modern forms of religious vitality emphasized by the classical paradigm's critics. And in light of ongoing debates over multiple modernities, they would need to describe and explain the varieties of differentiation in societal and cultural comparison. In critical discussion of Charles Taylor's contribution, the limits of culturalist theories of modern secularity as well as some tasks for historical-sociological research on religion in modernity are identified.##

##Hope or peace? Spaces of the mobilization of transnational peace networks since the last Gaza war

After the last Gaza war in 2009, an unusual meeting of Israeli ex-soldiers initiated a heated debate in the public domain. The soldiers confessed some uncomfortable insights about apparently pointless violence, but an internal investigation could not prove their allegations. At first glance, it seemed the military contradicted itself. This paper aims to show that such confusing events are not an isolated case, but the result of a strategy of mobilization of global acting activism networks which include NGOs, international donors and individual personalities. Based on fieldwork with Israeli activists and critically inspired by debates on ethnography and globalization, I follow complex configurations of actors that indicate zones of political friction. Activists operate in key areas of state sovereignty, rather than to stand opposed to it. There are two implications of the emerging power of these networks: on the one hand, the conflict on the ground seems to be transformed into a meta-conflict consisting only of signs and counter-sign; on the other it is here emblematic how classical political units, such as the state conceptualized as a unitary actor, seems at first glance to be dissolved, but also reproduced in an iconic way.##

Being experienced as foreign. Reading travelogues of Dorugu and Ham Mukasa

##Travelogues about other cultures, including accounts of Europe in different centuries, have been told or written about in many societies throughout the world. Recently anthropologists and historians have become aware of these. In contrast to the well-established genre of Lettres persanes they offer a genuine perspective for an interpretation of Europe from the outside. Moreover, travelogues about Europe have heuristic value in understanding a specific hermeneutic situation, namely readings of foreign travelogues and ethnographies about one's own or one's ancestral culture in general, also being an aspect of crucial importance for the study of globalisation in the longue durée. I take two African travelogues as examples. Ham Mukasa, a literate, English-speaking citizen of Buganda who visited England in 1902 to witness the coronation ceremony of Edward VII, experienced Europe as a spectacle his hosts had staged to impress, among others, guests from the colonies. But Mukasa also expected something miraculous from the outset, using phrases and images from the New Testament which he thought fitted the occasion. The second example, a story told by Dorugu, an illiterate Hausa boy brought to Germany and England by Heinrich Barth in 1856, shows us Europe from below from the perspective of a servant. Both reports are correct as far as the facts are concerned, but the sense expressed is not the sense Europeans had or have of themselves, or of things European. It might be tempting to attribute the impression these reports make on Europeans – the facts are correct, while the sense is missed – to the naivety of these African travellers. Could such a finding be a quality of all transcultural descriptions? At least, this is suggested by three Trobriand readings of Malinowski's professional ethnography.##

##Race on Stage: Performing Difference in Music and Dance in Paris, Havana and New York between the World Wars

This article analyzes the contributions of internationally mobile artists to cabaret performances referring to racial stereotypes between the World Wars. Musicians, singers and dancers classified in Cuba as mulatos or negros and female artists who were not conceded an equal access to the music business during the 1920s and 1930s seized new opportunities in the context of New York's Harlem Renaissance and Paris' Tumulte Noir. They were motivated to work in these cities not only for economical reasons, but also because of the potentiality they ascribed to cabaret music and dance as means for overcoming racism. I explore to what extent they were able to introduce versions of "black culture" that differed from the exoticizing representations privileged by "white" impresarios. The performances are analyzed as sites in which heterogeneous actors inscribed imaginaries of race. Travelling between the diverging racial regimes of the three cities (which all constructed a similar bipolar racial order), the artists instituted more realistic perspectives on music and dance on the transnational stages based on their local knowledge. Ultimately these Cuban artists contributed to a diversification of what was considered to be "black culture" in Havana, Paris and New York.##

Moreover, with few exceptions, there are also scarce ethnographic data on the therapeutic value of insects within indigenous healing systems. Most research on this topic has been carried out on Asian medical systems, where ancient and modern written sources prove that the use of insects and other arthropods as prophylactics, medicine and food is a fairly widespread practice. More recently, especially in Latin America and Africa there have also been several projects concerning the folk-use of insects. In the last two decades, medicinal insects have attracted more and more attention as bioscience has been discovering its highly specific chemical substances as defensive mechanisms or against microbial infestation for its possible pharmaceutical application. ##The conference brought together some of the world’s most important experts from different disciplines such as medicine, psychology, ethnobotany, pharmacology, law, religious science, and anthropology involved in research on ayahuasca, and promoted a mutual dialogue with diverse ayahuasca users including western ayahuasca adepts, Amazonian healers, religious leaders and activists. We gathered contributions from the majority of participants, as well as some additional collaborators... The book seeks to describe and analyze the diverse forms of ayahuasca use throughout the world from a multidisciplinary perspective. It was our specific goal not reduce the varieties of practices, experiences and scientific perspectives into a single model or to provide a simplified risk assessment. Instead the book makes available a general overview of the topic, ranging across multiple cultural, health and legal aspects. Like the expansion of ayahuasca itself, the addition includes voices from the north and south, from urban and rural areas, from scientific and spiritual perspectives: in a word, a range of discourses from across a continuum of hybrid possibilities.##

Keywords: self-distinction, distinction, individual cultural profiles, homogeneity, heterogeneous cultural profiles, cultural profiles

##The individual and the mixing of genres - Cultural dissonances and self-distinction

By considering cultural practices and preferences in terms of intra-individual behavioral variation it is possible to construct a model of the social world which does not neglect individual singularities and avoids the cultural caricature of social groups. Thus, it becomes clear that the boundary between "cultural legitimacy" and "cultural illegitimacy" does not only separate different social classes, but divides up the cultural practices and preferences of individuals themselves across all classes. Without challenging the existence of social inequalities in terms of the most legitimate forms of culture, such a scientific point of view allows to establish the marked statistical frequency of individual cultural profiles composed of heterogeneous or dissonant elements. The article considers the socio-historical conditions that produce heterogeneous cultural profiles and shows that these frequent cultural dissonances allow to reinterpret the social functions of culture and to highlight the importance of the study of intra-individual behavioral variations within the framework of a sociology of dispositional and contextual plurality.##

Ethnography after the „crisis of representation“. Essays related to Paul Rabinow und Bruno Latour

Lemke acknowledges strong traces of the „crisis of representation“ in social research. She takes up these traces in reflecting on research on an art-pedagogical project, „sense&cyber“ for the use of new media in four art schools in Lower Saxony, Germany. Using Rabinow's and Latour's notions her study moves from „small points of observation“ (oligoptics) of „hypermedial ethnography“ to rough contours of a „pedagogical anthropology of the contemporary“. She considers this to be an innovative approach for an ethnographic philosophy in the area of education studies.

Merging horizons

Paideuma 57.2011:7-35

Keywords: equality, informants, anthropologists and equality

##,Merging horizons' is an epistemological stance adopted by anthropologists who aim to share an ethos of equality with the people they study. In the process, both parties – observer and observed – explore how far their views of the world coincide and how far they differ. We have used this concept of merging horizons not only to characterise our various activities as students, researchers and teachers of anthropology, but also to throw light on our personal relationship. What does it mean to do fieldwork as a couple? What were our different backgrounds, and how did we meet, bond, separate, and bond again? How did our interests develop? How far did they coincide and how did they differ? The story is told with an eye on the figurative power of events, as well as on the many surprises and reversals that have occurred in the drama of our lives.##

##In the name of the state. The secret society of the torturers

Torture is an extreme act of collective violence that is secretly executed in the name of a state. In order to explain the reasons why people torture others, individualist approaches concentrate on individuals' motives or interests. Contrary to that, the article argues that torture should be understood as a social relation. Thus, it takes the social relations of the group of torturers as a starting point. Firstly, following Georg Simmel's analysis of the secret society the paper argues that the group of torturers can adequately be conceptualized as a secret society; secondly, against this background the article reconstructs the conditions which structure torturers' agency; finally, this article offers an outline of the processes and dynamics that allows for explaining the phenomenon of torture. The thesis of the article argues that a relational sociology helps better explain and understand the social phenomenon of torture.##

Culture, Volk, and race. German anthropology during National Socialism and its reappraisal

##German anthropology has started to deal with its own role during National Socialism just since the eighties. Although important research has been conducted since then, significant issues remain to be discussed. Therefore, the following article aims at two subjects in order to arouse further debate. On the one hand, the theoretic and practical conjunctions between anthropology and National Socialism are being analysed. On the other hand, the postwar anthropological examination of the own past itself shows specific reductions and rationalisations which are to be explored. They indicate that form and content of dealing with the National Socialist past still shape today's anthropology.##

Grounded theory reader. 2nd updated and enlarged edition

This book presents an overview of the development and current situation of Grounded Theory methodology. The „founders“ present their positions and research strategies, in papers and interviews, and prominent „practitioners“ of the method discuss challenges of Grounded Theory – epistemological preconditions and research practice.

Die Feldpartitur. Multikodale Transkription von Videodaten in der qualitativen Sozialforschung

Keywords: transcription, video transcription, multicoding, multimedial coding, Grounded Theory, signs, symbols, field score

The field score. Multi-coding transcription of video data in qualitative social research

The author defines the field score as a sign and symbol system for the multi-codal transcription of video data, for researchers in the social sciences and humanities working qualitatively. Using this method video data are no longer exclusively directly translated into text data as done in current transcription conventions, but audiovisual processual data will be captured by transmitting carriers of meaning in a two-axes system, a score: in their linearity, and by using signs and symbols also in their simultaneity. This is based on the assumption that videos, based on images, sound, and process data are to be taken as an individual system of expression, symbols and signs – vis-à-vis the system of language. Thus they can be captured only to a small degree of its components, contained in the medium, with the methods of text transcription. All of this is explicated in theory, with three case descriptions.

CouchSurfing as socio-cultural practice. Alternative tourism in the age of the Web 2.0

The author considers CouchSurfing to be „alternative tourism“ in the age of the web 2.0, since more than three million registered users offer places to stay overnight („on their couch“) in the internet – for free, on the condition of mutuality. In the book this transnational network of hosts is researched – focusing socio-cultural practices of the users. With a perspective of the cultural sciences/folklore studies he inquires into questions of delimitations and their opposite, and on action strategies and styles of traveling. The author finds the members of this „community“ to be scattered around the globe, coming from bourgeois and middle class settings and influenced by post-Fordist patterns of living such as the intersection, or interconnection of leisure and work, and they tend to instrumentalize „online/offline structures“. The study is based on empirical work: participant observation, qualitative interviews as well as quantitative online questionnaire.

Corruption as a secondary type of order

In the book basic relations of an illegal or corrupt kind are analyzed as ‚institutions‘ creating types of order: political clientelism, corruption, Mafia, warlords, terror – using theories of social capital, systems- and network theories, the economy of institutions, enlarged property rights concepts, and a concept of second-life economy. The Mafia, Yakuza, and Kenyan interfaces of political and economic corruption are a special focus, as are conditions for stability of corruption and mafiose structures and their ‚achievements‘ (regardless of their illegal character).

##Cultural Heritage or Intellectual Property Rights? Local strategies in Dealing with Cultural Resources

Cultural Heritage and Intellectual Property Rights are two means of protecting cultural achievement. They are western concepts that have been widely adopted by nation states in the course of globalisation and promoted by arguments of the circulation and preservation of cultural goods in the interest of humankind. The international discussion on immaterial cultural property generally neglects the existence of local concepts of rights in cultural institutions and their history. This article analyses local concepts of rights in immaterial cultural goods in southwest cameroon. It illustrates the importance of their history for the understanding of what exactly is preserved by cultural heritage. In the course of the growing transatlantic trade activities, the owners of localized cults and rituals transformed these institutions into an alienable resource. Since then interested parties were able to acquire them under certain conditions, use them for income generation and sell them to other interested parties. The sale concerned not the rights of original creators but those of ownership and performance. Since the 1990s, these cultural institutions were increasingly understood as exclusive, traditional cultural goods restricted to specific administrative units. This development has to be seen within the framework of the UNESCO activities of preserving cultural heritage on the national level. In this way, the UNESCO encourages the establishment of concepts of traditional culture owned by ethnic groups even though these cultural goods may have been acquired rather recently and are owned by groups of individuals who paid others for obtaining their ownership rights.##

##The Message of the Seventies - An Obliging Heritage for 'Ethnomedicine' in the 21st century?

Invited by Joachim Sterly/Hamburg to co-found the Society for Ethnomedicine (AgE) (1970) I worked together with him and Wemer Stöcklin/Basel to build up the journal Ethnomedizin/Ethnomedicine journal for interdisciplinary research (1971). I felt attracted by the interdisciplinary perspective of both of these projects and lived to see the growing insight into the inter-ethnic analogies and the concepts of the knowledge to cure ("Heilwissen") in other cultural communities. As a doctor in rehabilitation medicine I discovered the (psycho) therapeutic way of this ethno-medical perspective, especially in the context of family dynamics. On the other hand I was irritated by the fact, that there was much knowledge with the many disciplines in our society, but no ability and skills to work with the dynamics of our group in using its scientific and personal resources. My paper will show that researchers and their objects in the social fields are building up new group-settings. The developmental chance of this group-setting depends on communicating the experiences of these group members in mutual respect. In this attitude Georges Devereux (Paris) agreed with us, when we discussed our research with him.##

On a factual basis. Festschrift for Thomas Bierschenk

There are 30 articles in this festschrift celebrating the 60th birthday, following Bierschenk's motto that the field determines what is there, what is to be done, following the „social realities of the field“, avoiding naive empiricism or romantic idealization of local voices. He has worked on the state and statehood, development, local forms of power, and strategic Fulbe groups, all based on long-term field research, mainly in West African Benin and the sultanate of Oman. He has focused on that which is „in process“, hybrids, contradictions... – to discover sources of social dynamics, innovation and change.

Symbols of culture. Studies of everyday life and its analysis „Phenomena of everyday life“ should, according to the author, be considered as important in cultural analysis. This volume includes several studies on technology and civilization, embodiment and experience, material culture and museum, and spheres of the unconscious in culture and cultural science. Taking the artifact, a gesture etc. as starting points, the author proceeds to wider cultural historical and theoretical contexts in order to show in such cases how to read „signatures of culture“.

„Humboldt’s legacy“. An answer to Larissa Förster

##This article replies to the exhibition review by Larissa Förster by explaining the context of the exhibition and its setting in a wider perspective. A good review of an exhibition should include some research into the conditions and the time schedule that are decisive for the success of such an enterprise. Mainly two factors were decisive for the final shape of the exhibition "Anders zur Welt kommen": the political influences of representatives of the main cultural institutions involved, and the rather short time period of less than one year for an exhibition of over 1500 square metres. The main misunderstanding of the review lies in the fact that Förster uses statements made by the political representatives of the cultural institutions and compares them with statements by the work of the curators in the exhibition. The exhibition was never intended as a preview of the planned Humboldt-Forum but to give some idea of the work in progress. Normally this is not done. Neither the new museum in Paris nor other large institutions put on special exhibitions as previews of their new museums. In this context it is also evident that an exhibition can never touch and deal with all possible themes. And even if the presentation of the subject of colonialism is important, that does not mean that every special exhibition has to deal with it. The exhibition 'Anders zur Welt kommen' offered several new perspectives not only in its design and presentation, but also in how it described and explained objects which will be further developed in future exhibitions of the Ethnologisches Museum Berlin.##

Öffentlichkeit als methodologisches Prinzip. Zur Tragweite einer praxis-theoretischen Grundannahme

Keywords: Practice Theory; observation; social epistemology, distinction, Bourdieu, P., praxeology

##Publicness as a Methodological Principle. The Scope of a Basic Tenet of Practice Theory

##The assumption that social practices are public and thus observable is a basic tenet of practice-theoretical approaches. On the one hand, the "publicness assumption" defines the praxeological criticism of subjectivism as well as of relying on hypothetical structural entities. On the other hand, a certain conception of the "publicness assumption" allows critics to reproach praxeology for its limited analytical scope. In this article, we explicate in several steps the contentious - and often implicit - basic assumption that social practices are public in several steps. We sketch a notion of social practices and their fundamental "publicness" which avoids presentist misinterpretations and conceptualises sociality as chains of practices across time and space. We do so by referring to the works of Schatzki, Wittgenstein, Giddens, and Latour. In these, the carriers of practices (artifacts, symbols, media, bodies) and the translocal structures they establish acquire particular significance. In a further step, we present some methodological considerations corresponding to the "publicness

assumption" and exemplify these by referring to Bourdieu's study of "Distinction".##

##Social media, mass media and social reality construction

Since the 1990s, the Internet serves as a projection space for varied visions of a more transparent and integrative public sphere and a less dominant role of mass media in the social construction of a "common" reality. In light of those expectations, this text scrutinizes the relations between digital social media and mass media from a systems-theoretical perspective and observes the present preferences of German onliners as well as the content quality of network communications (weblogs, podcasts, social networking services, microblogging). The investigations lead to the conclusion that social media and mass media are situated on complementary levels of publicness.##

„Killer games’ versus ‚We will fund violence’. The perception of digital games and mass media in Germany and Australia

Frankfurt/M.: Lang Verlag 2011

350 pp., Euro 58,95; ISBN 3-631-60611-7

Keywords: digital anthropology, cyber anthropology, killer games, games (digital), culture and games

##While the assessment of digital games in Germany is framed by a high-culture critique, which regards them as an illegitimate activity, they are enjoyed by a wider demographic as a ‚legitimate’ pastime in Australia. The book analyses the social history of digital gaming in both countries and relates it to their socio-cultural traditions. Concerning social history, Australia almost depicts an inverse mirror image of Germany. Its foundational dynamics, closely associated with different egalitarianisms, led to a different form of distinction than in Germany - a country whose national self-conception was closely related to groups which perpetuated an idealistic notion of Kultur and later integrated it into a rigid class system. The book not only demonstrates how the discourses on games follow long-established patterns of rejection and approval of mass media but also regard them as an access to the inner workings of both societies. How the games are perceived tells us a lot about German and Australian identity.##

##What Tools Do. Towards a Micro-Analysis of Medical Work

Medical work is deeply mediated by technology. In line with constructivist studies of medicine and technology, this paper conceptualizes routine medical work as being fundamentally marked by uncertainty and indeterminate situations. To account for the agency of the means of medical practice in such situations, current discussions about the agency of technology are critically reflected and adapted to the analysis of medical technologies. Drawing on ethnographic observations in operating theaters this paper traces the empirical distribution of medical work between ensembles of humans and machines as well as the handling of uncertainties in daily practice.##

##On the Formation of Social Memory

Contemporary sociological theorizing about social memory affords two alternatives: either theories follow the suggestions of Halbwachs and ground social memory in collective interactions, or they start from processes of functional differentiation and connect the formation of social memory to key media and dominant forms. In discussing both variants of the sociological understanding of social memory, we identify factors of variation and selection in its formation. As factors of variation we identify functional, cultural, and generational differentiation, mediality, authenticity, and the communicative genres of narrativity and discursivity. These factors are combined with relevance as a mechanism of selection within a theory of the formation of social memory based on the sociology of knowledge.##

##Held in Heidelberg from September 29 to October 2, 2008 by the collaborative research center SFB 619 "Ritual Dynamics", the international conference "Ritual Dynamics and the Science of Ritual" assembled most of the leading experts on rituals studies and more than 600 participants for the purpose of reassessing the traditional subject in view of the latest research. The results, which are presented in five volumes, are pathbreaking for future transcultural, interdisciplinary and multimethodical research on rituals. The convention was marked by the broad range of disciplines and the corresponding diversity of methods. It embraced a great variety of topics in terms of cultural geography and spanned a time horizon from antiquity to the present. The proceedings show how broadly the term ritual can be defined, as well as the conditions, modes and functions of ritual actions in different cultures of the present and past.##

Reziprozität. Einführung in soziale Formen der Gegenseitigkeit. 2. Auflage

Keywords: reciprocity, direct reciprocity, generalized reciprocity, exchange, social exchange

Reciprocity. Introduction to social forms of reciprocity. 2nd edition

Stegbauer deals with everyday social reciprocity in this introductory textbook. He argues that causes for this behavior are not to be sought in individual purpose-means calculations but is rooted in the relations of the partners of exchange. There is no single-dimensional principle in this kind of reciprocity, but relations between those exchanging govern the way and value of products being exchanged. Thus, the author starts by using Marshall Sahlins's categories of direct and generalized reciprocity, and continues by discussing the reciprocity of roles, of perspectives, in order to conclude by designing a „sociology of social relations“.

##Pirates captivate the western cultural imagination at the beginning of the 21st century. QUEER BUCCANEERS addresses this phenomenon through an analysis of the Disney film series PIRATES OF THE CARIBBEAN. Reading the films from a variety of post-structuralist perspectives, this study demonstrates the contradictory discourses and power relations that characterize the series. It argues that 'piracy' constitutes a sliding signifier that facilitates the (de)construction of discursive boundaries of gender, sexuality, race, ethnicity, class and nationality.##

##Domestications of foreignness. The Interpretation of Trance and Possession in Anthropology and in the Culture of Mediumistic Healing

The handling of trance and possession is often brought into focus in anthropological literature and has challenged rational explanations. The interpretation of such experiences leads to questions concerning the conceptualizing of the body and the soul, and thus „the Self“ as well as leading to the question of the relation between "the Self" and "the Other". The emic discourse of the mediumistic healers in Germany I have researched as well as the etic discourse of anthropologists about experiences of trance and possession in religious contexts oscillate between finding the origin of such experiences inside and outside the Self. On the one hand "spirits", "Energies" and similar things are seen as autonomous entities affecting the Self, while on the other hand they are seen as having originated in the Self through projections of the unconscious or through imagination. Even some phenomenological approaches which actually aim to conceptualize experiences beyond dichotomies such as inner and outer or the Self and the Other, like the much cited approach of Thomas Csordas, tend to entangle themselves in such dichotomies and tend to trace back experiences of the other as having originated in the Self. This paper traces different emic and etic conceptions of body, soul, the Self and the other and, against this background, argues with reference to the German philosopher Bernhard Waldenfels for a phenomenology of otherness which is grounded in the assumption of an otherness of experience itself and offers an alternative to one-sided externalizing or internalizing inter-pretations.##

The missionary society. Microstructures of a colonial globalization

The author assesses Christian mission, Catholic and Protestant, as a way of globalization, very much in concord with colonialism. The focus is not on „theological visions of Christianity and belief“ but on social processes triggered by mission, social manifestations of the „missionary situation“. Wendt thus focuses on specific local situations and discusses mission settlements as locations of social order, forms of missionary segregation politics, education and mission, indigenous helpers and native clericals. The final sections deals with the „missionary society“ as a global-historical factor.

Ethnology and psychology. The Leipzig School of the psychology of peoples

In Germany, the disciplines of ethnology and psychology emerged in Leipzig. The author describes the relations between them exemplarily in seven influential persons: Adolf Bastian, Wilhelm Wundt, Friedrich Ratzel, Karl Weule, Alfred Vierkandt, Richard Thurnwald and Willy Hellpach. These scholars propagated distinct concepts of their fields, like: anthropology as ethnic psychology (Bastian); psychology of peoples as psychic evolutionary history (Wundt); anthropology as historical cultural geography (Ratzel); anthropology as cultural foundational science (Weule); anthropology as ethnic sociology (Vierkandt); psychology of peoples as social ethno-psychology (Thurnwald); psychology of peoples as ethno-characterology. Another chapter is devoted to the idea of structure in ethnology and psychology, which is elaborated in the case of Felix Krueger and Fritz Krause, and influences of this approach to structure is briefly described in ten other scholars. The final chapter asks if there are remnants of the idea of structure even today: in the context of time, in persons, and in contents.

Media culture and social structure. Sociological analyses

Ziemann argues that late-modern society has developed a rigid dependence on media technologies and (audio-visual) mass media. This has led to an operational adaption and change of structure in many societal areas, but also new ways of thinking, worlds of imagination, forms of action of subjects have emerged. The author problematizes the reciprocal, or mutual relation of production and dependence of media, society, and subject, and confronts the sociological theory of society with observations in the areas of cultural history and changing media science. He concludes that media culture has to be conceded a categorial and also practical pre-eminence.

Violence and gender. Perspectives in the social sciences on sexualized violence

Sexualized assault has always been part of personalized and organized violence, in civilian contexts, in spaces open to violence, or in war. Present-day violence and conflict, however, show increased sex-based cruelty, and one may ask whether such forms of injury, torture and mutilation are new forms of violence. This has been researched only marginally until now.

„Every car has an offence on it“: Register polizeilichen Handelns bei Verkehrskontrollen in Nordghana

Sociologus 61.2011:197-222

Keywords: corruption, negotiation and dominance, ambiguous police work, police practice and culture

##Police traffic stops in Northern Ghana

Police traffic checks in West Africa are normally only mentioned with reference to corruption. Yet anthropological research of these everyday bureaucratic interactions can also develop how police officers implement the law, refer to morality and sociality. Police practices evolve in adaptation to internal and external conditions and must constantly be socially legitimized. On the everyday level, the police are not enforcers of the state's monopoly on violence, but must establish their dominance through negotiation. Thereby the discretion of police officers is guided by multiple rationalities or registers. In order to countervail uncertainties in specific situations they dynamically choose registers which are not clearly separated, and they often draw them simultaneously. Selecting violence, public order, formal law, or sociality enables heterogeneous and ambiguous police work, in the face of missing formal guidelines and low legitimacy of the police. Corruption can be understood as a special subset of police discretion, as deviant and functional practices at the margins of it. Law and social order remain meaningful during these interactions, even if they are ultimately violated. Since the actual use of registers is highly influenced by civilians, police rationality can be seen as the result of everyday negotiations. Civilians have considerable means of influencing the police through the use of violence, connections, status and money. Police action cannot be understood as unilateral enforcement of either the state's laws or private interests; rather it is open to expectations and social beliefs of civilians. Adaptation and openness of police practices reveal that the implementation of laws and the reproduction of social order are co-produced by civilians, which enables a new perspective on police practices inside and outside of West Africa.##

Keywords: fieldwork, police and fieldwork, bureaucracies and fieldwork, civilians and police, participant observation

##"Ground work" and „paper work" Access to police organisations in West Africa

Drawing on our experience requesting access to police organisations in Ghana and Niger, this article explores the organisation and operation of two West African bureaucracies. It focuses on the administrative modes and the state agents' routines in their dealing with civil actors. Exceptional and risk carrying requests such as ours concerning a permission to conduct participant observation in police organisations create insecurity on the part of the bureaucrats concerned. Although rarely expressed in field reports and often discounted as a series of fortunate coincidences, we consider the researcher's access (or refusal) a crucial and illuminating moment of fieldwork. In our case, both technical bureaucratic operations and informal networks played a central role in our own approach as well as in the state agents' work routines and reflections on their daily occupation. Following an emic description, we call these two modes of procedure "ground work" and "paper work". The oscillating between the two reflects an inevitable interlacing of bureaucratic and informal operations, characteristic for bureaucratic organisations worldwide.##

##Hunting for Pirates. The Development of copyright in the context of Orality in Sub-Saharan Africa

Author rights have developed from centuries of legal acquisition of immaterial goods in the Western hemisphere. A pressing question in this context concerns the meaning and the effects which the imposition by the imperial West of these legal structures has upon legions of the world that had and will continue to have their own sets of rules concerning the treatment of such goods. This article will discuss the local practices concerning the treatment of intellectual property in sub-Saharan Africa before examining the local interpretation of the newly introduced regulations and concepts. It will be shown how local agents, aware of the challenges these new laws entail, succeed in benefiting from their disadvantaged status and from positive law. They explicitly achieve this by complaining about pirates robbing them of their respective returns and blaming the state for its inefficiency in upholding the author rights.##

##Creole configurations of return migration between coercion or the search for refuge. The meaning of return visits in Cape Verde

Based on anthropological research on Fogo and Brava, two Cape Verdean islands, this article focuses on migrant return visits and their particular meaning for "regrounding home", understood as an idea, a social construction as well as a physical place. After reflecting on the particularities of Cape Verde as a creole and transnational society since its historical beginnings, the author examines the banderona, a patron saint festivity, which since centuries annually draws thousands of migrants back to their islands of origins. What initially served as a hierarchic moment between colonial masters and slaves, later turned into a transnational ritual, used for celebrating the upward social mobility of migrant visitors and for redistributing their material gains. In our days these ritualized return visits constitute an important opportunity for reaffirming social ties and for negotiating asymmetric family relations. While non-migrant islanders make use of the festivity for articulating their needs and for claiming diasporic support, migrants express their social visibility and their willingness to contribute to a transnational livelihood. The author analyzes this articulated interest in maintaining home ties also in the context of the most recent shifts in the world economy, which force migrants to reassess their living arrangements in the diaspora as well as the viability of an eventual permanent return.##

Keywords: history of anthropology, anthropological theory, transnational migration, migration, postcolonial anthropology

##Introduction: Afro-Atlantic Alliances

This introduction outlines the theoretical framework of this special issue on "Afro-Atlantic Alliances". After summarizing key moments in the history of anthropological research along the Atlantic rim, the authors reflect on the interdisciplinary encounter which shapes the current debate on Afro-Atlantic cultures. By introducing "alliances" as a conceptual framework, ideas of relatedness and belonging as well as of entangled histories are recomposed in order to establish a methodology which aims at provincializing the traditional centers of power and at overcoming a methodological nationalism. This special issue brings together contributions on the impact of historical forms of return migration to Sierra Leone, on the meanings of contemporary migrant return visits to Cape Verde; on Mozambican students' agency in Cuba as well as in their country of origin; on Cuban artists' impact on race as an outcome of travelling between and performing in Havana, Paris and New York; on transnational Yoruba religious networks in Cuba as well as on Cuban and Brazilian actors' strategies with regard to their religious practices and their migrant status in Germany. In the afterword to this thematic issue recent paradigm shifts in the study of the Afro-Atlantic world are discussed.##

The West – Sodom and Gomorrah? Western women and men in the focus of Egyptian muslimas

The author poses the question of how Egyptian Muslimas conceptualize the western world – as utterly depraved, the women living in the terror of seeming freedom? In this way she reverses the common perspective. Her study is based on fieldwork, describing living conditions of urban Egyptian women – family, partners, profession, religious questions, emancipation, and modernity, and she found very differentiated answers, much more diverse than the image of a Sodom and Gomorrah described in the media. She deals with patriarchal Egypt society, the ‚fight‘ in the mini-universe of the family, ideas on the ideal male partner, what jobs mean to them, and the question of feminism.

The CBD in the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC): The project "The Cuvette Centrale as a reservoir of medicinal plants" in the process of implementation

Curare 34.2011:51-62

Keywords: biological diversity (CBD), medicinal plants, traditional medicine, Nagoya Protocol

##The Convention on Biological Diversity (CBD) has three major objectives: 1) the conservation of biological diversity, 2) the sustainable use of its components, and 3) the fair and equitable sharing of the benefits. Here we exemplify implementation of the convention in DRC by presenting history concept and vision of the project "The Cuvette Centrale as reservoir of medicinal plants". Special attention is paid to local plant diversity with focus on medicinal plants, striving towards a better understanding of their threats and safeguard. For this, we document diversity and traditional use of plants in both (a) the country's interior and (b) the urban area of Kinshasa. Both in- and ex-situ measures designed for the conservation and sustainable use of specific plant resources for local and regional levels are presented. In order to develop visions beyond, the project has started a process of bringing together users and providers on a bilateral level to assess ways suitable to all parties to directly benefit from the utilization of indigenous plant resources towards the conservation of biological diversity and the sustainable use of its components. We show the current state of this process developing guidelines for a bottom-up approach of CBD implementation adapted to traditional requirements. The example shows both the potential as well as the urge for DRC to use its biological resources sustainably in order to safeguard them for future generations. It discusses the significance of the Nagoya Protocol adopted at the 10th Conference of the Parties in October 2010 for this and future processes.##

Care for Health and Body: An Ethnobotanical Approach to Nkundo Plant Use (Cuvette Centrale, DRC) with Focus on the Significance of Indigenous Knowledge for the Human Skin

Keywords: ethnobotany, Cuvette Centrale, medicinal plants, skin ailments, plant secondary compounds, Nkundo pharmacopeia, Bantu, ethnopharmacology

##The data presented here are based on a long-term study sponsored by the Federal Ministry of Education and Research on assessing the floral diversity of the Congo Basin with a focus on medicinal plants. Between 2002 and 2007, interviews concerning 446 vernacularly known plants were held with one of over 250 ethnic groups living in DRC, the Nkundo belonging to the Bantu people. Of these plants, about 85% were used, with the largest proportion, about 60% of all ethnospecies, applied in the medicinal context. 91 of 201 species used in medicinal applications, belonging to about 50 families, were applied in the context of skin problems. They were grouped into 12 disease groups. Most species were cited as being applicable for wounds, abscesses and ectoparasites, less for onychia, mycosis, burns and eczema and least for allergies, ulcers, acne, aphtes and dermatosis. Here, we investigate the botanical, ethnospecific and phytochemical characteristics of the species cited. We assess the relation of plant secondary compounds and area of application and seek generalities as well as specificities of the skin-specific plants represented in Nkundo-pharmacopeia by reviewing literature on African medicinal plants used outside DRC. Our analyses are intended to document and assess the traditional knowledge of the Nkundo, which has only been transmitted orally up to now. In this way, we hope to prevent its loss and to underline both the need for and significance of the floral diversity of the Cuvette Centrale, both for its traditional use and the protection of a world heritage site for nature and thus mankind.##

##In this paper I would like to examine one problem, which has been haunting the kingdom of Oku from its beginning up to the present time, viz., the troubled relationship between the Fons of Oku and the Ntul clan, the original inhabitants of Oku. The „Ntul problem“ seems to show its ugly head whenever the „land has become bad,“ i.e., when Oku is confronted with serious problems, either external or internal. The diviners consulted at such times, invariably diagnose the problem as going back to the usurpation of power by the immigrant Mbele clan. According to one tradition it was Mkong Mote, the most important and, by now, with many legends surrounded ancestral Fon of Oku, who seized power from Baba əbfon, the king of the Ntul. Another version, documented by Bah (1996), attributed this feat to Nchiy, third in the King list given by Babey Ghande.##

Keywords: diaspora, Creole identity, home, purity, ethnic „purity“, indigeneity, Krio

##The coming-out of the diaspora as home. Creole identity in Sierra Leone's post-war society

The Krio are descendants of liberated slaves, who, on the background of heterogeneous origins, developed a new ethnic identity. They tended to set themselves apart from the local population and differentiated among themselves by ascribing different degrees of purity to members of their community with purity being equated with non-mixture with locals. They were not considered "proper" natives by the local population and being a minority living almost exclusively in Freetown were seldom considered for political office beyond the local level. However, an increasing number of Krio have recently become politically engaged on the national level. Simultaneously, processes of selective indigenization are under way which help reconstruct Krio origins in ways that allow them to situate themselves in the national context more prominently. Their engagement nevertheless evokes ambivalent reactions. Being somewhat less "one's own" and less "native" still bears negative connotations but as the reputation of tradition and indigeneity has suffered as a result of the war, being less associated with either also carries new and positive meanings. It seems that in this time of contested loyalties and identifications, the Krio are increasingly discovering and making use of the potentials of transethnic connectivity that lie in their creole heritage.##

##Al-Qaeda's influence in Africa is growing. From 2009 to 2011, activity by Al-Qaeda was noted in 19 African nations and regions. Four regional Al-Qaeda organizations operate on the continent, which in turn often have several sub-organizations: the Egyptian Islamic Jihad, the Libyan Islamic Fighting Group, Al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (with its sub-organizations Al-Qaeda in Mali, Al-Qaeda in Mauritania, Al-Qaeda in Morocco and Al-Qaeda in Sudan) and Al-Shabab in Somalia. Since Osama bin Laden's death on 2 May 2011, the influence of African leaders within Al-Qaeda has increased significantly. All three presumed members of the strategic command level originate from Africa. The revolutions of the Arab Spring have not harmed Al-Qaeda. This contribution highlights the potential for further expansion by Al-Qaeda on the African continent, and how this needs to be responded to.##

Origin of the Yoruba and „The lost tribes of Israel“

Anthropos 106-2011:579-595

Keywords: Yoruba, „tribes of Israel“, migrations, state foundation, conquest state, dynastic traditions, king lists, oral traditions

##On the basis of comparative studies between the dynastic tradition of the Ọyọ-Yoruba and ancient Near Eastern history, the present article argues that Yoruba traditions of provenance, claiming immigration from the Near East, are basically correct. According to Ọyọ-Yoruba tradition, the ancestral Yoruba saw the Assyrian conquests of the Israelite kingdom from the ninth and the eighth centuries B.C. from the perspective of the Israelites. After the fall of Samaria in 722 B.C., they were deported to eastern Syria and adopted the ruling Assyrian kings as their own. The collapse of the Assyrian empire is, however, mainly seen through the eyes of the Babylonian conquerors of Nineveh in 612 B.C. This second shift of perspective reflects the disillusionment of the Israelite and Babylonian deportees from Syria-Palestine towards the Assyrian oppressors. After the defeat of the Egypto-Assyrian forces at Carchemish in Syria in 605 B.C. numerous deportees followed the fleeing Egypto-Assyrian troops to the Nile valley, before continuing their migration to sub-Saharan Africa.##

The Ethnic Politics of Coup Avoidance: Evidence from Zambia and Uganda

Africa Spectrum 46,2.2011:3-42

Keywords: coup d'état, military insurrection, coup avoidance, ethnic politics

##Though military interventions seem endemic in sub-Saharan Africa, more than a third of all countries have been able to avoid military coups. To solve this puzzle, this article relates the likelihood of military coups to the degree of ethnic congruence between civilian and military leaders, arguing that coup avoidance is most likely when government and army either exhibit the same ethnic bias or are both ethnically balanced. This argument is illustrated by a comparison of the diverging experiences of Zambia and Uganda. While Zambia is among Africa's coup-free countries, Uganda's vulnerability to military intervention has varied over time – with four coups under Obote and the Uganda National Liberation Front (UNLF) but no coups under Amin and Museveni. Drawing on original longitudinal data on the ethnic distribution of political and military posts, the article shows that the absence of military coups in Zambia goes back to the balanced composition of government and army. In Uganda, coup avoidance under Amin and Museveni can be linked to the fact that government and army exhibited the same ethnic bias, whereas the coups against the Obote and UNLF regimes reflected either ethnic incongruence between civilian and military leaders or the destabilising combination of a similarly polarised government and army.##

Körper und Sinne bei den Wolof Nordwest-Senegals. Eine mikroethnographische Perspektive

Body and senses among the Northwest Senegalese Wolof. A micro-ethnographical perspective

##Despite much interest being shown in the senses by anthropologists and ethnographers in the last two decades, the conundrum of the universal or culturally specific nature of sensory experiences, usages and meanings across cultures has not been resolved. This is partly due to methodological problems in effectively studying this phenomenon cross-culturally. This article suggests microethnography as an adequate method capable of escaping from this limbo. Drawing on thorough ethnographic fieldwork supported by videographic recordings in north-western Senegal, it explores the sensory worlds of elders in interaction on a Wolof village square. As will be shown, their embodied sensory practices differ fundamentally from those in Western settings, even though no individual sense is revealed to be dominant, as previous studies in the anthropology of the senses have suggested. In particular, Wolof interactants realize conversational functions with audio signals or touch that, in Western societies, are proved to be accomplished by gaze. These differences in embodied sensory practices are to be explained by conceptual, ecological and spatial rationales.##

From process to procedure. Elders' mediation and formality in Central Ethiopia

(Aethiopistische Forschungen 75)

396 pp., Euro 76,-; ISBN 3-447-06611-2

Keywords: communication and law, elders and law, formality and law, law and mediation, mediation and law

##The basis for presenting the ethnographic material in this book is the 'ethnography of communication', a theory and method that were developed by the sociolinguist Dell Hymes... The descriptions and conclusions presented in this study are based synthesis of observations made during my stay in the field, various field recordings and transcriptions of interviews or verbal exchanges that I brought with me from Ethiopia, as well as in-depth analyses of video sequences after my return to Germany. Re-occurring patterns and consistencies between the single cases and oral descriptions were analysed, and examples drawn upon for illustration. The individual interviews and instances of participant observation used in this analysis are listed in the appendix... As a result of this empirical study it can be deduced that just as habitual actions can be instrumentalised, instrumental behaviour may become habitualised and generalised at a collective level. Such instrumental behaviour is thus applied in a 'routine' manner without losing its effectiveness. While there are activities that are executed primarily because they are required by 'the law' or 'the ancestors', there are other actions that are well planned and means that are providently applied by participants in formal procedures. There is no open discussion, at least not in public, about some such consciously and deliberately used strategies. Laws, for instance, are seldom meant to be questioned. Despite the fact that officials may dissemble the contingent human processes that originally gave rise to a particular law (lest the law lose its 'eternal' force), a 'rule' may well constitute the outcome of a conscious act of decision-making. Rules and laws, over the course of history, have often been debated and negotiated in very specific decision-making settings by law-makers.##

Researching South-South/South-East migration. Transnational relations of Cameroonian Muslim migrants

Keywords: migrants, south-south migration, Muslim migrants

##This article presents selected findings from an ongoing research project on the transnational relations of Cameroonian Muslim migrants. It highlights two aspects, namely the asymmetries and complexities of communication between migrants and families left behind, as well as migrant realities in Gabon and the United Arab Emirates. The project centers on South–South and South-East migration, thus challenging and complementing the focus on South-North migration prevailing in academic and policy-related research. It traces changing patterns and perceptions of mobility, explores migrants' experiences in „foreign lands“ and their reflections about „home“, and engages with migration regimes as well as migrants' responses to regulatory mechanisms.##

The article takes the tremendous popularity of televised productions of "Malian cultural traditions" as a window to explore the interlocking of mass mediation processes and state-orchestrated cultural production in the making of collective identities in postcolonial Mali. The article seeks to understand how television, as a particular technology and institution of mediation, plays into the process of "authentication" (understood as subjective processes through which notions of the authentic are sensually mediated and aesthetically re-cognized), and how it thereby complicates official invocations of national community by furthering spectators' subjective experiences of local particularity.##

##In Africa as in other parts of the world, research in medical anthropology has, over some time now, recorded the emergence of new forms of healing practice that are marked by a recombination of elements taken from Western medicine, Christian faith healing, or other contexts. In applying the concept of (social) institutions, this paper uses the example of a specific Malawian healer in order to outline the analytic limitations posed by thinking of such an arrangement exclusively in terms of medical pluralism comprised of separate institutions of healing, and their subsequent syncretisation. Inspired by Bourdieu's concept of the 'field', I suggest distinguishing between different levels of analysis on which the different institutions of healing play, both empirically and analytically, very different roles. In so doing, this paper means to support on-going claims to put agency and dynamic processes of social transformation into focus of medical anthropology.##

##The Maale of southern Ethiopia are a parilineal and patrilocal society. Women move from one homestead to another one, while men usually stay with their patrilineage from childhood until death. While it has been argued that the movement of women leads to a lack of continuity which results in a weakening of their identities, this article demonstrates the advantages women gain by shifting residence. Instead of struggling to redefine their identities, they acquire multiple identities, which they can make rational use of.##

##In Tanzania, the Marian Faith Healing Ministry offers Catholic healing rituals under the patronage of the Virgin Mary. Exorcism and a special water service are central to the healing process. People bring physical, spiritual and social afflictions before the group's leader, Felicien Nkwera. Combining the perspectives of the study of religions and medical anthropology, the author analyses Nkwera's pastoral texts and the personal healing narratives of the members. Thus, a complex image of the healing process is created and framed within its Tanzanian interreligious context and its global conservative Catholic context.##

Keywords: native Americans, Indians (American), media, knowledge, modernity, indigenous modernity

The discovery of indigenous modernity. Indian media worlds and knowledge cultures in the USA

Bender inquires into the role of Indian media, particularly broadcasting and newspapers, in the present process of the emergence of their establishing a good command in indigenous knowledge culture – consisting of an educational system of their own and a renewed and manifold festival culture. Bender has focused on the Ojibwa Reservation of Lac Courte Oreilles (population 5000) in Northwestern Wisconsin. This case shows that the original inhabitants of North America live in modernity since a long time, in their specific indigenous version of modernity. After introducing the place of fieldwork the author discusses conditions for the emergence of indigenous media, among others the Treaty Rights controversy. Further chapters deal with the educational system, festival culture, and more generally: religion, knowledge and identity in this indigenous modernity which includes questions of Christianization and literalization, millenarianism and religious diversification, and subjective religious imaginary.

Black or Red Atlantic? - Mozambican Students in Cuba and their Reintegration at Home

Keywords: south-south relations, educational migration, socialism, agency, individual approach, migration and education

##This article presents the experiences of Mozambican children who were sent in the 1970s and 80s to study in Cuba as well as their professional and ideological orientation after their return. Challenging collectivising perspectives on either an Anthropology of the Afro-Atlantic or Socialist Internationalism, this contribution focuses on an individual and his agency in the highly regulated and disciplined context of Cuban schools. However, this context must be described in order to appreciate the agency. Thus, the article shortly presents Cuban-African relations after the Cuban Revolution, it describes how the students were selected, sent abroad, were assigned their subjects, were sent back home and finally integrated into the work force – or in the latter case – how the state failed to do so. It shortly looks at the current situation of African students in Cuba with respect to issues of race and identity and how the Cuban discourse of Cuba, being an Afro-Latin nation, owing its development to the work of Africans and paying it back through its missions of solidarity, is experienced by African students.##

Keywords: Bororo, photography, visual anthropology, museology, Baldi, M.

##The single largest group of images in the collection of the Museum für Völkerkunde Wien (Museum of Ethnology Vienna) are the photographs taken by the Austro-Brazilian photographer Mario Baldi (1896-1957) between the 1920s and the time of his death, when this group of documents was received from his estate. Since the pictures (negatives, prints, and slides), numbering somewhere between 10,000 and 15,000, were mostly without documentation, it was decided to catalogue them under a single number, in the vague expectation that one day the problem of the missing documentation could be solved... Mario Baldi's Bororo photographs turn out to be a major contribution, both in terms of quantity and quality, to the visual documentation of the Bororo in the 1930s. The present paper was designed to put Baldi's work in a comparative perspective in an attempt to point out both its merits and shortcomings as well as to provide a basis for a brief discussion of the contributions of visual representations to the ethnographic data base.##

Traces of salvation expectations in Guatemala Highland in colonial times

##During an insurrection in the community of Totonicapán in 1820 Atanasio Tzul was crowned to be King of the K'iche'. In this article it is argued that his coronation was not a spontaneous event. In fact, it can be related to a complex of ceremonial dances and oral histories. Through an analysis of ethnohistorical sources from the 16th century it is shown how the heirs of the pre-Hispanic elite developed the idea of an indigenous kingship. These ideas influenced the development of ritual dance dramas re-enacting the Spanish Conquest. Various sources confirm that beside these dances oral traditions about pre-Hispanic history survived well into the 18th century and that there was a belief in a return of the ancestors and the rebirth of the indigenous kingship. This belief, which culminated at the end of the colonial period, outlasted the events in Totonicapán and even today traces of it can be observed.##

Golden tropics. The co-production of natural resources and cultural difference in Guyana

The tropics and their inhabitants cause longings, greeds, and fears, and today, according to Grimmig, worrying over biological and cultural variety is predominant, and both are historically interwoven. In the case of the Kari'ña in Southeastern Venezuela the author shows the repercussions caused by the external exploitation of natural resources in the course of centuries, both on nature and on cultural and social conditions. In this analysis, connections between the periphery of the resources and industrial centers, between materiality and discourse, and productive inclusion and marginalization become visible. The chapters discuss colonialism and the El Dorado, gold-digging and the Kari'ña, the „white gold“ of india rubber, the „black gold“ of oil (Indios petroleros), wood as a natural and economic resource, and the „green gold“ of biological diversity and indigenous knowledge, and reflecting on all of this, Grimmig concludes that we deal with a coherent narrative of the powerful expansion of global capitalism.

##Archaic Anatomy. Remarks about the iconography of Cerro Sechín from the medical point of view

Cerro Sechín is an archaeological zone in Peru. The site is unique. It owes its significance to large monoliths with bas-reliefs dated at 1700-1300 BC. In a schematizing and form-reducing style the bas-reliefs show representations of two very different groups of figures: dignitaries and mutilated human remains. Apparently Cerro Sechín was a political and ceremonial center where human sacrifices were performed. Some representations show evidences that sacrificial activities exceeded primitive cutting off and began to explore the internal structure of the human body. The most valid of these evidences are bas-reliefs which portray typically oesophagus, stomach and intestines as a preparation en bloc. From the medical point of view the iconography of Cerro Sechín presents specific pictorial arguments that here existed amazing anatomical knowledge about 3.500 years ago.##

Places of power. On the meaning and concept of sacral places among the West Apache

The author analyzes sacred locations of the Indeh' or Western Apache, including current cases of conflict, and she defines sacral space in this context as accumulation of religious fields of meaning in the Apache world view. These indigenous ideas of a continuum between sacral and non-sacral space enable new perspectives on the definition of sacrality. In the book a detailed description of religious imaginary of the West Apache is included. After defining central notions of her study the author portrays the Western Apache, their religion and world view, changes of their religion in the 20th century, sacral places like ceremonial locations, burial sites, places of keeping ceremonial objects, altars and shrines, and she distinguishes immanent sacral places and multiple sacral places – giving examples for both. Chapter 6 deals with conflict around sacral places, like the Mount Graham Observatory and the question of telescopes and religious rights as a central case. The book includes sacral places in US laws, a glossary, archival sources, documents, and unpublished material.

Die Mapuche in Südchile - Skizze eines Konfliktes

Tribus 60.2011:95-123

Keywords: Mapuche, conflict, colonialism, land rights, Pinochet, A., timber industry

##The Mapuche in Southern Chile - Outline of a Conflict

The Mapuche in Chile are facing a violent conflict with the Chilean government. The origin of this dispute is the dramatic loss of cultivable land. At the end of the so-called pacificación de la Araucanía in 1833, the Chilean military began to appropriate land in the core area of the Mapuche, from south of the Rio Bio Bio to Puerto Montt, and including parts of Chiloe island. European settlers, especially Germans, Belgians and Italians, were invited to settle in the Araucanía and provided with land - taken from the Mapuche. This process went on until another even more dramatic period for the Mapuche started. Under the dictatorship of Augusto Pinochet (1973-1990) the Mapuche again lost a high percentage of the land that was left after the pacification. The democratic governments all tried to restitute at least a part of that land, but most of it is now in private ownership, be it by great land owners or by the timber industry that is dominant in the region of the Araucanía. The Mapuche, being unsatisfied by the - in their eyes - inadequate results of that restitution, are offering resistance to the Chilean state. Mapuche that are caught in violent acts or even just suspected of having committed one, are kept in confinement and judged under the "anti-terrorism-law" (Ley Antiterrorista) that originated in the Pinochet dictatorship. The article outlines the history and origin of the conflict, and includes the author's personal observations deriving from a short field-work trip to the Araucanía.##

Comments on Brazil's 2010 Resolution Regulating Ayahuasca use
Curare 34.2011:298-304

Keywords: Ayahuasca, drug control, religious drugs, CONAD

##This text provides a summary and analysis of the process of regulation of the use of ayahuasca in Brazil, from its first prohibition in the mid-eighties to its permission for ritual and religious purposes. It reviews the main legislative documents, anthropological literature pertinent to the topic, and expert opinions. Special emphasis is given to understanding the recent 2010 Resolution published by the Brazilian National Council on Policies about Drugs (CONAD), which establishes a "deontology of the use of ayahuasca," and recommends the application of a set of rules, norms and ethical principles. This resolution does not indicate forms of control or sanctions to be applied in the case of an offense, leaving space for some juridical ambiguity. The paper reflects on current debates evolving out of the 2010 CONAD Resolution, and speculates on possible future implications. It also considers how dialogue between government representatives, researchers from different disciplines, and leaders of the ayahuasca-drinking groups influenced how the decisions were made regarding regulation of ayahuasca. The anthropological argument that native knowledge should be taken into account is a rather compelling one, but a model that is seldom adopted in cases of drug control. Brazilian legislation is pioneering in adopting this path, and the recognition of the right to religious use of ayahuasca has influenced judicial decisions in several countries.##

The spirits of the New World. Religious and social integration of Brazilian spirit beings in the Candomblé of Santo Amaro, Bahia, Brazil Leuschner discusses spirits in Brazilian Candomblé other than (African) orixás, which originate rather in the New instead of the Old World. He investigates them regarding their role in socio-religious life in the town of Santo Amaro da Purificação in Bahia. It shows that the candomblé still is a highly dynamic „field of play“ of transculturality. Leuschner describes the various categories involved in the candomblé there (umbanda, the orixás, the terreiro, iniciação and confirmação, eguns, festas pra orixás) and Brazilian spirits. In his conclusion he frames the findings into: the theological order, the ethnic order, socio-religious integration, and Re-Africanization versus Umandization. He found that through the inclusion of foreign spirits a kind of religious and thus worldview-related integration of the New World into the belief system of the Afro-Brazilian candomblé believers took place. The negotiation of this New World, which has become the increasingly globally influential melting pot of Brazil, and the role of the African element within it, is a continuous process.

Drugs for Senility: Two Moments of Alzheimer's Treatment in Urban Brazil

Keywords: Alzheimer's disease, personhood, medical anthropology, old age

##In the 1990s, the medical category "Alzheimer's disease" started to be discussed in the Brazilian media. As had happened previously in other countries, Alzheimer's in Brazil became the raison d'être of a number of geriatric and gerontological organizations and institutions. This paper presents the results of two ethnographies undertaken in the geriatric milieu in Rio de Janeiro, one around 1995, the other one ten years later. Data from participant observations and interviews with patients, caregivers, and health professionals illustrate how the new category 'Alzheimer's disease' reshaped the contemporary landscape of aging in urban Brazil and how medications in the two studied moments (1995 and 2005) played an important role in the making of personhood.##

Contemporary Sioux artists and the market

##In the early twentieth century, a two-dimensional style of 'Indian Art' was developed, which was focused on marketing and became the 'authentic' Native American contemporary art. Even though native artists started to paint in new styles not later than in the 1950s, an important part of the market for contemporary Native American art has remained highly stereotypical, especially in rural parts of the United States like South Dakota where Sioux artists struggle between the expectations of the market and their own artistic demands. Even though some of them place high artistic demands on their work, which is usually also a representation of Lakota culture, they are or feel dependent on the market and the wishes of their customers, as well as the expectations of the art world (see Becker 1982) of South Dakota. Some artists submit to the market as they have to make a living. As Del Iron Cloud clearly remarks: "We all have to pay bills!" Others, mostly academically trained artists, try to stay independent from this influence and want to help the younger generation arrive artistically in the twenty-first century. As the influence of the place and art world of South Dakota is huge, these artists want to make the young people leave the reservations to see other art worlds and to learn how art can be more than something through which just to earn enough money to survive.##

„Jesus is the same Arutam“ Logics of appropriation among missionized Indians and indigenized missionaries

Anthropos 106-2011:493-510

Keywords: Achuar cultural change, Shuar cultural change, glocalization of Christianity, Christianity, mission, Lévi-Strauss, C., Descola, P., arutam power

##This article challenges Claude Lévi-Strauss' and Philippe Descola's diagnosis of the South American tropics, according to which the irreversible influences of the Western civilization have led to cultural homogenization and to the loss of autochthonous "originality." This author discloses local reactions to global impacts as appropriation processes and emphasizes the natives' agency. The missionary presence in the Ecuadorian Amazon has strongly influenced the native cosmology of the Achuar and Shuar, to which Descola particularly refers. However, Jesus has not replaced the indigenous spiritual power called Arutam. Rather the contemporary role and function of Jesus and Arutam exemplify the negotiation of cultural meanings. The article further analyzes the transcultural conditions of this appropriation and focuses on the inner logic of the indigenous and missionaries who create and define these new meanings. It demonstrates that the expression "Jesus is the same Arutam" does not necessarily illustrate the assimilation effects of cultural contact but rather the openness of cultural systems and the creative "originality" of the actors involved.##

##Women migrant workers as tourists on their way from Bolivia to Spain

This article deals with the journey of Bolivian migrant women to Spain. It analyses the structural conditions of the trip as tourists and „undercover“ labour migrants and relates them to the womens' travel experiences. Important actors to avoid political restrictions of entry are travel agencies. It will be shown how the women situationally enact strategies to pass border controls and what they feel having to conceal their actual identity and intentions.##

The stone in the shoe. On peaceful, civil resistance in violent conflict regions. A case study of the peace community San José de Apartadó, Colombia Civilian victims in all present conflicts are more numerous than those of soldiers. In the armed conflict in Colombia since more than 40 years, the civilian population has frequently been target of violent attacks from leftist Guerilla as from rightist paramilitary groups and governmental security forces. As a result of such military action, millions have been evicted, tens of thousands have been dead and disappeared, and many have been kidnapped etc. Since the end of the 1990s some villages of especially endangered regions have declared themselves to be „peace communities“. Their inhabitants have pledged to be neutral, refuse to collaborate with all armed actors, and strongly claim their rights as civilians. The author analyzes emergence, function and structure of one such peace community, San José de Apartadó, and asks why the inhabitants prefer to live in this community instead of escaping from this area.

##Radical neutrality as rightful resistance? Civil peace initiatives in the Colombian regions of conflict

This article explores the opportunities of civilians to peacefully resist violent conflicts or civil wars. The argument developed here is based on a field-based research on the peace community San José de Apartadó in Colombia. The analytical and theoretical framework, which delimits the use of the term resistance in this article, builds on the conceptual considerations of Hollander and Einwohner (2004) and on the theoretical concept of 'rightful resistance' developed by O'Brien (1996). Beginning with a conflict-analytical classification of the case study, we will describe the long-term socio-historical processes and the organizational experiences of the civilian population, which favoured the emergence of this resistance initiative. The analytical approach to the dimensions and aims of the resistance of this peace community leads to the differentiation of O'Brien's concept of 'rightful resistance'. The opportunistic and measured version of 'rightful resistance' is contrasted with a normative and idealistic one, based on radical neutrality and the avoidance of armed protagonists.##

Between adaptation and resistance. Female homeworkers in Recife/Brazil. Subject formation and its structural conditions in peripheral capitalism

Paid housework is a functional part of peripheral capitalism in Brazil. By transferring housework to socially disadvantaged women in rich and bourgeois families in Northeastern Brazil, inequality of gender and class are reproduced. The author has investigated this setting by interviewing such employees, to discover the relationship between them and the women for whom they work. So, the great divide in Brazilian society shows in the microcosm of the family. Neuhauser poses the question of resistance against this rule, the relation between adaptation and resistance. The analysis includes male roles, how poverty is characterized and appears ethnographically, various narratives relating to Brazilian identity, relations of inequality, and a sketch of the labor union of female houseworkers in Recife and its function in forming political subjects.

##Constructing Yoruba and Lúkúmi tradition through transatlantic networking in Afrocuban religion

This contribution focuses on a very specific project of constructing authentic tradition by one of the most famous cult leaders in Afrocuban Santería. His model of tradition is generated within transatlantic networks of Africanization in Yoruba-based religions in the Diaspora. Emphasizing a larger project of ritual innovation he represents a very specific model of Lúkúmi tradition which is rejecting contemporary modes of Santería. Instead of that it refers basically to a former religious tradition in Cuba at the beginning of 20th Century which is reclaimed to get restored again. Its realization is based on multiple connections to religious actors, practices, debates, oral and written sources from Nigeria and the so-called Yoruba Diaspora. Aiming at a transatlantic vision of restoration of both Cuban and African Yoruba tradition, this model of religious innovation is on the one hand compatible with what is called by religious and scientific agency "Global Orisha/Yoruba World Religion". On the other hand it represents a very exclusive Cuban resource within the global spectrum of Yoruba religions. Introducing this Cuban religious project, its protagonists and debates, I will finally reflect this within an alternative, marginalized perspective on space-temporal and symbolic locations and discourses between Africa and Diaspora.##

Appropriation of public space. Rio de Janeiro

This study is based on fieldwork in 2009, involving nine persons. Schmidt inquired how globalization processes affected the city, what the „leading image“ of the city was, and how official policy affects actors in public space. Furthermore: which actors are involved in conflict regarding public space, what are their strategies, and whether there are social movements to this end. Schmidt started from the observation that urban public space still forms an ideal of integration and convergence of the city as a social unit. Globalizing and neoliberal city planning influences change this idea, however. The author discusses multiple „publics“, and she thus discusses questions of what the city is, rights, and rights for whom, who has a right on the city, and she concentrates on the activities of two movements, the „Security Project of Ipanema“ and a project for the homeless to make power processes visible.

##The article concerns the relationship between the agrarian cycle of potato production as well as traditional notions of fertility and growth, on the one hand, and the syncretic, Aymara-Christian, cosmovision, on the other, as expressed in the choreography and symbolism of popular dances of the Bolivian Altiplano, preserved and practiced both in the indigenous - rural and in the "mestizo" - urban (for instance Kullawa and Diablada dances) cultural environments. The author concludes that in all analyzed cases a strong emphasis is placed on "good production" and gender roles, as manifested in the symbolism of abundance, reproduction, and erotism.##

##Beyond center and periphery. Toward the symbolic dimension of capitalism

The central question for Karl Marx concerning the specific role of symbolic domination in capitalism challenges us down to the present day. We continue to improperly perceive the symbolic and immaterial structure subjacent to capitalism that is responsible for its peculiar "symbolic violence." This article analyzes two interrelated issues: first, the racism implicated by concepts that articulate central and peripheral capitalism; and secondly, its principal consequence, which is the absence of broad and encompassing concepts in modern social theory. This eliminates a chance to articulate universal contexts - at least as universal as capitalism in its global expansion. The reach of contemporary critical theory is therefore limited in terms of central questions. Among the concepts that are abandoned by the fragmentation and contextualization is that of social class and that of the symbolic violence produced by structural changes that encompass capitalism as a whole. The following article draws on empirical studies concerning under class and the „new“ middle class conducted in Brazil to illustrate its thesis.##

Cultures of health. Experiencing meaning in dealing with psychic illness. An anthropology of health promotion

This study is based on fieldwork in a Candomblé and Umbanda temple in Brazil, a related Candomblé temple, compared or related with a psychosomatic clinic in Germany, and a community psychiatric unit in Chile. All of these studies are supplemented by theoretical literature. Wiencke uses an individual-centered view on health and disease, and augments it with social and dimensions of meaning, and how these, in turn, are rooted in special resources and power structures. He thus develops a psychological anthropology of promoting health in cases of psychic disease taken from the fieldwork situations. It becomes clear that positioning the disease in social practices, worlds of meaning, and moral orders are an important step towards a comprehensive science of health – ranging from „individual“ to „public health“.

During the era of slavery Jamaica has been a „monstrous vexation“ of human society. Under the terror of European slaveholders enslaved Africans generated the wealth of the white rulers. It was almost impossible to escape, and attempts to do so often ended with mutilations and death. But in the hilly jungles those having fled organized armed resistance, so Jamaica became a stronghold of maroons, black freedom fighters. Their historical success against oppression had strong symbolical effects on later Black protest movements: Rastafari, Black Power, and modern cultural expressions such as Reggae and HipHop – they are to be read in the frame of practices of Black people in the diaspora.

Translocal Art Worlds in Times of Medialization. Some Observations of India's Contemporary Art World in Transition

Keywords: media, art worlds, global art, east-west art

##India and its booming art world is one of the most prominent examples of recent developments in the global art scene and its shifting financial and cultural hubs. This article first addresses the notion of decentralization of the contemporary art world by providing a brief insight into the recent shift of the art market from "West" to "East" and by introducing the term "art world" as an art-sociological concept that seems particularly appropriate for tackling both the globalization and the medialization of contemporary art worlds. This is followed by a brief description of the rise and fall of the Bodhi Art galleries as an exemplary introduction to one of India's prime art-world players. The contemporary Indian art world is then portrayed as a new subsystem of Indian society, the focus being on the structural changes that have occurred during the last twenty years. The role of the media is singled out as one of the most prominent influences on the changes within the Indian art world, concluding that the relevance of the examination of contemporary art and medialization as exemplified by the Indian art world cannot be overemphasized.##

Darstellungen der Psychiatrie in indischen Filmen

Zeitschrift für Ethnologie 136.2011:69-92

Keywords: psychiatry in movies, movies and psychiatry, possession, schizophrenia, Bollywood, modernity

##Portrayals of psychiatry in Indian films

In contemporary India, psychiatry and mental health have emerged as issues of growing public attention. This new interest is also played out in the production of Indian films dealing with psychiatric themes. Beginning with the observation that the emergence of the medical category of "schizophrenia" coincides in the history of Western modernity with the early production of psychiatric movies, this article examines portrayals of psychiatric institutions, psychiatrists and mental illness in recent Bollywood-, Regional- and Art-Films. The latter show psychiatric motives related to or contrasting with diverse Indian understandings of madness embedded in religious or cosmological schemes such as possession. Films are analyzed in terms of the popular images of psychiatry they convey which are seen as reflections of different social contexts and diverse understandings of Indian modernity. As the films differ in regard to the evaluations accorded to non-psychiatric explanations of mental illness they provide audiences with different imaginations of Indian modernity and the place of psychiatry and religion therein.##

##In the Vietnamese science community, knowledge production and sharing are still limited. Based on intensive field work in South Vietnam, the author investigates how organizations operating in the field of water research understand and practice knowledge management. The national science policy, culture and tradition, international collaboration and local market forces all contribute to the current conditions of knowledge exchange in Vietnam. It is shown that the concentration of organizations in "knowledge clusters" could possibly increase the innovative capacity of R&D which represents a key driving force in the country's ambitious plans of becoming a middle income country.##

Feeding gods, feeding guests. Sacrifice and hospitality among the Gadaba of Highland Orissa (India)

Keywords: Scheduled Tribes, Gadaba, food, sacrifice, hospitality, kinship, feasting, shame

##The study of food in Indian tribal societies merits more attention than it has received. The example given here concerns the Gadaba of Highland Orissa (India), and particularly two contexts are compared: sacrifice and hospitality. Sacrificial commensality during annual festivals stresses agnatic relationships, unchanging hierarchical group relations, and strictly prescribes social action. Hospitality, by contrast, mainly involves affinal relations and highlights equivalence while also expressing temporary status difference. The hospitality situation leaves room for idiosyncratic behaviour and rivalry that are expressed in competitive feasting and force feeding. Hospitality also entails the notion of "shame" that is absent in sacrificial contexts.##

##When Uday Shankar and his company launched their inaugural world tour in Paris in 1931, European and American audiences received the ensemble enthusiastically. How could this group of foreigners have been so successful on Western stages? Bringing together numerous reviews on Shankar and early ethnographic writings, Diana Brenscheidt gen. Jost examines the distinct, often spiritually-based, image dance and music from India held at the beginning of the 20th century in the West, an image which would also crucially affect the perception of native dance and music traditions in India itself.##

The author contextualizes the study by discussing (German) comparative musicology and Shankar's, also literature on Indian music/,Hindustani' music, also orientalism by referring to British Orientalism. She refers to ancient Greek tragedy and modern dance, Richard Wagner's ,concept of the united artwork', then Indian dance (natya, and Tandava Nritya). The next chapter deals with ‚movement and the body‘, again a comparative study of Eastern and Western aspects and notions, and the last chapter discusses religious/mythological aspects of dance, again against the background of its opposite, western modern dance.

Megacities – Global cities today: The age of Asia?

Demographically Asia has now regained its hegemonial position which was manifest until the first half of the 19th century. Today, 13 out of the 20 biggest cities are located there, among them the Pearl River Delta occupies the first position. On a national level, the term of high-level growth region only applies to Japan, South Korea, Taiwan, and parts of China. The authors, geographers, first portray the demographic setting in detail: comparing interculturally the USA, China, and India. Then, other regions of Asia are described, including relational aspects like questions of the speed of growth. The second part deals with the national dimension, the third with the global dimension.

The revolution devours its children. Lacking legitimation, pedagogical violence, and organized terror among the Khmer Rouge

##The article shows how the dynamics of violence under the Khmer Rouge regime were intimately linked to the unusual process of seizing power in the war-ridden country. The central thesis is that the Khmer Rouge were facing a fundamental lack of legitimation in the eyes of the population and their own movement which made it necessary for the leadership to transform the people into ‚true‘ loyal socialist subjects. The party, which strengthened itself by incorporating many different military factions during the civil war, was fighting for power and control in the country and its own divided movement. The major problem and the upshot of violence under the Khmer Rouge was that the population and the movement's own members were far from being faithful socialists. Hence, to transform the people into loyal subjects, which would keep the communist party in power, the regime installed a complex system of terror aimed at the correction of the 'rebellious' and 'deluded' psyche. Michel Foucault's analysis of techniques of subjugation helps to explain how the regime tried to transform and control its people. In order to build a new society, Angkar attempted to build new people.##

How Wide is the „Treatment Gap“ for Antidepressants in India? Ethnographic Insights on Private Industry Marketing Strategies

Keywords: antidepressants, depression, medical anthropology, psychotropic drugs, marketing drugs

##It is widely believed that depression goes largely untreated in India: too few psychiatrists are practicing, too little money is made available for psychiatry by national and state governments, and too much social stigma is preventing detection and treatment. This paper argues that these commonplace arguments about depression cannot be wholly true. If a methodology is used that starts with the actual availability of antidepressant drugs rather than the availability of medical personnel and institutions, a different picture emerges. Based on ethnographic findings from the collaborative research project "Tracing Pharmaceuticals in South Asia" (2006-2009), which followed fluoxetine (Prozac) through production, distribution, retail, prescription, and regulation in India and Nepal, the paper first describes a stunning proliferation of psychopharmaceutical drugs. It then details how a multitude of generic drugs also lets a multitude of private medicine shops thrive. The paper argues, furthermore, that the relatively lax regulation of drug retail allows floating antidepressant prescriptions to disseminate prescription patterns beyond a small band of psychiatrists. The key conclusion is that the data currently used for assessing the magnitude of treatment gap between developing and developed countries must be expanded by ethnographic data on pharmaceutical uses.##

This saying refers to the interaction of different ethnic-religious communities (Sunnites, Christians, Alawiteq Druzes) at local sanctuaries, which I encountered during my ethnographic field research in the Middle East. This article focuses on the cognitive construction of holy places and its relation to collective identities in the present-day Arabic Republic of Syria. My argument is that statements in the sense of „Kullnā miṭl ba^cd“ are an outcome of the theoretical construction of holy places in the context of baraka. It is mainly an epistemological way of thinking the sacred which is commonly shared by members of all the different ethnic-religious communities - within the little tradition.##

##Bearing in mind this desideratum of interdisciplinary effort in the study of South Asian Cartography, the Vārāṇāsī Research Project "Visualized Space – Constructions of Locality and Cartographic Representations in Banaras" at the South Asia Institute, in Heidelberg, has chosen the North Indian pilgrimage centre Banaras (Vārāṇāsī, Kāśī) for a survey and case study concerning one specific local tradition of spatiality and cartography. The present study is based on material collected in the sub-project, "Visualized Texts – Religious Maps and Divination Charts", headed by Axel Michaels. The research for this project revolves around the study of visualizations of space as represented by various kinds of "maps", including painted pictorial maps, printed pilgrimage maps and simple spatial charts. For the purpose of the present study, "maps" shall be defined as images of spatial knowledge. No clear-cut distinction exists between spatial texts, maps that vizualize spatial texts, and images. Any distinctions given are conventional and depend on specific social, cultural and religious constructions of spatiality. The fluidity of the terms "map", "image", and "text" is also reflected by the names assigned to the studied material... Taking this fluidity of categories into account I have opted for a broad interpretation of the term „map“, which will include pictorial maps, panoramic views of high aesthetic value, „word pictures“, simple charts, along with topographical, revenue and pilgrimage maps.##

This paper analyzes the stereotypes in the characters of three of the most well-known Indian Americans on TV. It is divided into two different sections: In the first part, the foundations for the case studies are laid, including a short discussion of the theoretical approaches used, a general assessment of stereotypes of Indians and Indian Americans with special emphasis on the "model minority" myth, and the presentation of the hypothesis and the case study selection. In the second main section, the case studies of Apu Nahasapeemapetilon ("The Simpsons"), Neela Rasgotra ("ER - Emergency Room"), and Amita Ramanujan ("Numb3rs") are described and analyzed. Uniformity in the Cultural Revolution? On the connection between cut/pattern techniques and ideology in China in the 1960s and 1970s

Until today, uniformly dressed masses are a familiar picture of the Chinese Cultural Revolution (1966-1976). Often, it has been interpreted as a sign of political repression. But in modern industrial societies formal and informal uniformity of dress is also frequent and a phenomenon of belonging and delimitation between identity constructions. The author inquires into the aims of uniformization during the Cultural Revolution – whether it was ordained from above or emerged as fashion „from below“, whether it was due to economic necessity or political calculation? The book is also an introduction to the economic and technological foundations of garment production during that period and portrays the history of Chinese dress in cultural and political context since the beginning of the 20th century. Using cut/pattern instruction books of that time Hopf shows techniques of cutting and production. Comparing them with photographs of what was actually worn at certain events the intention of the dress becomes clear. She concludes that causes and forms of expression of uniform dress was rather complex and not „homogenous“.

Envisioning the Future. Negotiating Public Space in Hanoi and Singapore

Internationales Asienforum 42.2011:345-369

Keywords: public space, authoritarian governance, governance, social order

##Southeast Asia, former battleground of opposing ideologies, is increasingly turning to market liberalisation; in Vietnam the vision of a 'socialist-oriented market economy', in Singapore that of a 'knowledge society' is pursued. This paper assesses the influence of these visions on the local conceptualisations of public space. On Ba Dinh Square/Hanoi, official space is transformed into concrete public space through citizens' negotiation. In Singapore's libraries, the aim to foster knowledge production and creativity results in the construction of spaces for collaborative learning and discussions. This paper studies the political balancing act between tolerating the voicing of public opinion and upholding authoritarian governance practices, the focus being on the conceptualisations of public space and their role in redefining social order.##

##The following article deals with the problems of Old Turkic and Old Uyghur mantics. It is shown that various types of mantic practices (such as palmomantics, cybomantics, xylomantics, astromantics, etc.) are documented in the Old Turkic and Old Uyghur literature. In the article an overview is given on this various types of mantic practices among the early Turks as well as an attempt to classify Old Turkic mantic texts according to their content. ##

Ancestor Rituals for Pious Christians: Traditional Healers of the Minahasa in Northern Sulawesi, Indonesia

Curare 34.2011:173-181

Keywords: traditional medicine, trance healers, tonaas, walian, Christianity and ritual, Minahasa, ancestor worship, healers, Protestantism

##The Minahasa are an amalgamation of different ethnic groups in Northern Sulawesi, an area also known as the „Minahasa“, in Eastern Indonesia. The Minahasa have different types of traditional healers. Among these, the tonaas or walian are healers who heal by communicating with the ancestors, usually in trance rituals. Nowadays, the majority of the population are protestant Christians, but nevertheless the traditional rituals, grounded in the traditional ancestor cult, are still being used as a method for curing or granting wishes. During a ritual the healer enters a trance, thus becoming the medium for an ancestral spirit with special abilities. These spirits are able to work through the body of the healer during the trance in order, for example, to cure, grant clairvoyance, act as a soothsayer, or contact deceased relatives. Most of the healers and their patients consider themselves devout Christians and feel no contradiction between the ancestor cult and the Christian faith. Instead they have created their own explanations and hierarchies which combine Christianity and ancestor worship. In this essay, the historical dynamic of the position of these healers in the society is examined, tracing the importance of tonaas and walian from former times up to their present status, explaining how they interact creatively with today's conditions in order to find their niche. The paper reveals the innovative and flexible way of the healer to create a coherent world view and incorporate Christian elements in the treatment. Moreover, it shows the dynamics of the rituals which are being confronted with new needs of the patients in a changing cultural and social environment.##

Sultan Ahmed I. hoch zu Ross. Ein ungewöhnliches osmanisches Silsilenâme in Stuttgart

Keywords: Silsilenâme, Ahmed I, museology, Ottoman dynasty

##Sultan Ahmed I on Horseback. An unusual Ottoman Silsilenâme in Stuttgart

The Ottoman Silsilenâmes arranged as a sequence of genealogies, contain an Islamic world history beginning with Adam and ending with the reigning Ottoman sultan. Many of the prophets and rulers are represented by medallions showing their portraits executed in Ottoman miniature painting. But only the Ottoman dynasty is depicted in a complete series of portraits down to Sultan Mehmed III (1595-1603). It was in his reign that the first group of Silsilenâmes was produced in the Ottoman provincial town of Bagdad, the former residence of the Abbasid caliphs. The Linden-Museum in Stuttgart, however, owns the fragment of a Silsilenâme ending with the portrait of Mehmed III's son Ahmed I (1603-1617). It is the only one ending with his portrait and among all the Silsilenâmes it is an exception, as it shows him on horseback. The fragment consists of the loose cover, a single folio concerning pre-Ottoman history, and the complete series of the Ottomans. Thirteen pages are missing. From other sources we can conclude that it was produced between 1603 and 1612.

The pre-Ottoman folio deals with Abbasids, Khwarazm-Shahs, Chaznavids, and Assassins, including eight portraits. As all the earlier Silsilenâmes, the Stuttgart copy shows short standard texts between the genealogical lines, but there are interesting additions, none of the earlier copies has. The chapter on the Ottomans containing the 14 portraits of the sultans also repeats the standard text but again adds further information. Whereas the standard texts as a rule just mention the dates of accession and death, and the victories and conquests of the rulers, the added texts mention historical problems, culture and religion as well as neighboring states. Altogether these additions make the reading of the Silsilenâme more attractive and informative and in fact the condition of this Silsilenâme proves that it was used intensively by many people and consequently must have been accessible easily, most probably in a Mevlevî convent.##

Iki – interaction semantics in Japan

##The word iki is still used as a commonplace in contemporary Japan. This word originated in the Edo period and it is considered as a key concept for the culture and the art at that time since the publication of the famous book of the Japanese philosopher Baron Kuki Shûzô (1888-1941). In this paper I would like to interpret iki as the semantics of interaction and individuality and to suggest that the occurrence of these semantics represents the differentiation of interaction and society at that time. Finally, I would like to point out the similarity between the iki-concept in Japan and that of honnête in France.##

Special attention is paid to the creation of local and national schools as well as to the role of institutional and biographical dis/continuities. Within the academic field of anthropology in the Soviet republics, Russia-based research institutes and regional branches of the former Soviet Academy of Sciences played a special role. Explorations of this role and of the impact of ideology are pertinent to the controversial question as to whether the Soviet Union was essentially a colonial enterprise.##

##24 Examples of Filial Piety

The 24 paragons of filial piety, or nijūshikō in Japanese, trace back to Chinese origins and are rooted in the early Confucian sayings. This two-panel folding screen displays on gold foil background 24 poems written in Chinese characters (kanbun) by the master calligrapher Karasumaru Mitsuhiro (1579-1638) drawing on the poem compilation 24 Examples of Filial Piety made by the Chinese poet Guo Jujing (1260-1368). The Japanese Sagabon, a high-class series of Japanese literary classics published in the 1st half of the 16th century, took on among others this literary classic. A pair of used folding fans irregularly mounted onto the surface show the pictorialization of the 24 filial examples. It can be assumed that there was a second screen in existence with poems written in Japanese kana syllabary (waka) to form a pair. There are folding screens that stress the pictorial execution of the 24 filial examples rather than the poems, as can be seen, for instance, on a pair of six-panel folding screens in the collection of the Yale University Art Museum (New Haven). Probably a similar combination of a folding screen pair with calligraphy in Japanese and Chinese characters by Shōkadō Shōjō (ca. 1584-1639) can also be found in the collection of Kimiko and John Powers (New York). But the present piece is obviously a rare example of large-sized calligraphy in Chinese characters (kanbun) of the Kōetsu school on a folding screen.##

Mobile phone communication in Japan. On the cultural infrastructure of mobil phone appropriation

Mobile phones interact considerably with cultural contexts of its use, opines Peil, which is the focus of her analysis and systematization of this device. She does so in the case of the Japanese appropriation of this phone which is characterized by being a „media avantgarde“ (Chapter 2). The theoretical background is Cultural Studies as an integrating perspective, and Peil discusses mobile communication as a field of research in a long chapter (4). This requires contexts such as the „cultural infrastructure“ of this communication in Japan (5): demography, urbanization, traffic and mobility, and life at home. The factor of time is described, relations of family, friends, and strangers. The last chapter deals with media in a broad sense: script and language, orality and literacy, media as carriers of meaning, and transitions of media.

Investigations on anthropomorphic sculptures from Munaseli, Pantar, Indonesia

##The Alor-Pantar Archipelago is still one of the most under-researched areas of Indonesia. However, in January 2009 I was able to collect data on anthropomorphic sculptures in the Tanjung Muna area of Pantar. The study used photographs of objects that had been purchased recently by European private art collectors in order to elicit responses regarding the local mythology. I was also able to interview local traders as well as the dealer who sold the sculptures, which allowed me to document information regarding their origin and former use, as well as the circumstances under which they had found their way on to the international art market. Traditional marriage rules as well as black magic played a central role. Furthermore, in the course of my research by chance I learned of a contemporary ancestor cult connected to the construction of a new clan house and of traditional (pre-Protestant) forms of healing.##

The substitution of rare ingredients in traditional Tibetan medicine on the basis of classical Tibetan texts, their use in modern formularies, and a case study from Amdo/Quinghai

Curare 34.2011:83-96

Keywords: Tibetan medicine, substitution of pharmaceuticals, musk, bear-bile preparation, bshad

##The substitution of rare ingredients for ones that are more commonly found and locally grown has had a long tradition in Tibetan medicine. To date, ingredients grow mostly in the wild and traditionally contain plant, animal and minerals substances. Substitution is generally understood as the use of a drug, which has a similar pharmacological effect in place of one that is prescribed in a certain formula. However, substitution can also mean the use of another pharmacological substance that uses the same Tibetan name. The reasons for substitution are manifold. Cheaper ingredients often substitute expensive ingredients and substances, which are not locally grown, are often replaced with equivalents, which are prevalent in the region. This paper concentrates on the frequent use of expensive substances or rare animal parts as part of compounded Tibetan medicines commonly used in Qinghai or in the compilations published by different Tibetan or Indian authors. It will be shown that, with the exception of musk, modern preparations do not usually include animal parts from endangered species such as bear-bile or rhino's horn; rather, these substances are usually substituted. Following an introduction into the fundamental ideas of Tibetan pharmacopoeia with regard to substitution based on Tibetan medical texts, problems in connection with the exact identification of specific ingredients and their substitutes will be addressed. The quantitative use and relative amount of ingredients in modern formularies will be analysed and compared with the practice of compounding medicines and the option of producing pharmaceuticals. The field data was mainly collected in the Tibetan Hospital of Kumbum Monastery (1) (sku vbum dgon pavi bod sman khang) (2) in Amdo, Qinghai Province, China.##

Media Research Beyond Bollywood. Some Thoughts on a Systematic Media Perspective in India-related Research

Keywords: Bollywood, media research, movies, print media

##Recently, academia has discovered Bollywood and made it into a favourite new topic. Generally speaking, this is a very welcome development. Yet how do things stand with regard to research on all the other 'old' and 'new' media? These have experienced such an extraordinary boom in India in recent years that media development itself can be viewed as a crucial driving force of the new Indian "economic miracle". An enormous rift reveals itself, when one considers how little has been published hitherto about the country's press, for example, which continues to flourish in all languages spoken in India, or about the radio, over which the state recently relaxed its control. Also, how sensible is it for media-related research to continue to focus largely on individual media, given today's increasing media convergence and cross-media communication? And finally, what is the social science stance as regards processes of social change that are closely linked with the accelerated increase of mediated communication, a new field of research which has rapidly gained acceptance within the framework of media and communication studies? These are the three questions addressed in this article.##

##On the basis of some exemplary cases of "cosmetic" (in a broad sense) materials and practices I wish to demonstrate that changes in the field of cosmetics on the one hand are following the classical pattern of substitution known in the related field of traditional medicine, on the other hand they are subject to changing norms and economic and social conditions. Their research is accompanied by terminological problems of synonymy and polysemy, and some have persisted since classical times. Recent influences by industrial products have given rise to a change of priorities from religious or magic connotations to purely aesthetic ones.##

Poisonings in Nyingtri. Gossip in an East-Tibetan pilgrimage town

The inhabitants of the East-Tibetan region of Kongpo are said to poison pilgrims on their way to the sacred hill of Kongpo Bönri, and the name of Kongpopa (inhabitant of Kongpo) is almost synonymous with ‚poisoner‘ in Tibet. The idea behind it is that the energy responsible for wealth and prestige in the victim will be transferred to the murderer. So if someone goes to Kongpo people tell him he should take his own food with him lest he be poisoned. To find out about this gossip the author has interviewed lay people, monks in monasteries (in Lhasa...), and traditional medical practitioners in Nyingtri in 2006, and many statements are given in the book, in German translation. In analyzing the data the author also discusses the phenomenon of gossip and its theory. Functions behind these rumors are according to the author: to avoid accumulation of wealth in very few hands; delimiting inhabitants from pilgrims (creating distance); explaining unusual events that are difficult to explain; keeping up the values of their society by valuating contents of gossip. Also, the author discusses connections with witchcraft.

Indian labour migration to the Arab Gulf States. The impact of a growing interdependence

Keywords: labor migration, migration and labor, working conditions, Gulf laborers, living standards

##Historical ties, geographical proximity and a labour force surplus made India the natural answer to the Arab Gulf states' manpower shortage in the 1970s. Rising oil and gas revenues enabled the countries of the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) to invest heavily in their infrastructure, but forced them for demographic reasons to open their doors to manpower primarily from India. With more than five million migrants Indians represent the biggest expatriate community in the GCC region today. To attain a better standard of living for themselves and their families they incur heavy debts to take up employment on the Arabian Peninsula, only to be at the mercy of their kafil (sponsor) after their arrival. The sponsorship system, which is differently applied in every country of the GCC, results in exploitation and harassment that has no equal. Dependent on the vast armies of blue-collar workers from South Asia but at the same time threatened by their growing numbers and demands the Arab Gulf states have so far resisted increasing pressure from the Indian and Western governments as well as international NGOs to address the migrants' grievances and to improve their working and living conditions.##

movements or ideologies, it is also experienced on the micro-level of religious identities and individual agency. This article takes two female Muslim peace activists' biographical narratives and psychometric profiles to illustrate how the ambivalence and ambiguity of religion towards violent conflict unfolds its dynamics on the individual level. Both women struggle with and fight for religion in Gujarat, India - and both experience their own Muslimness as ambivalent and/or ambiguous. Their stories highlight the relevance of explorative empirical methods on the individual micro-level for an adequate understanding of religio-political conflict.##

Matchmaking 2.0. The Representation of Women and Female Agency in the Indian Online Matrimonial Market

Internationales Asienforum 42.2011:239-256

Keywords: matrimonial market, marriage ads, agency and marriage, matchmaking, femininity, media content analysis, online matrimonial market

##The first India-based websites dedicated to matrimonial matchmaking appeared on the World Wide Web in the late 1990s and the number of users has increased ever since. These websites provide a complex picture of young Indians searching for life partners. A detailed analysis of the matrimonial profiles offers a remarkable insight into the changing concepts of marriage, love, and gender roles. This article focuses on the construction and mediation processes of femininity. It is based on research conducted over the past three years both online and through fieldwork in India, mainly in Mumbai. The article analyzes how women are portrayed in the advertisements that appear on these websites. Another part of this media content analysis consists of profile analyses of female users and their self-representation online. The field research included personal interviews with users and media producers or operators. An analysis of these aspects shows not only how the medium is used, but also how female roles and ideals are negotiated in contemporary India. The article concludes with observations on the transnational dynamics of the Indian online matrimonial market, taking the Gujarati marriage market and its global medial and political network as an example.##

Keywords: patronage, family structure, legitimacy and change, decollectivisation, farmers and change, inequality, cotton farmers

##In this first detailed, grass-roots account of Uzbekistan's protracted decollectivisation, Trevisani explores continuity and change in relations between rural communities, agricultural producers, and local state authorities in the cotton-growing region of Khorezm. Built up during the soviet period, the cotton sector has retained its importance for the state and for rural communities in the years since independence, but economic growth remains modest, and social conditions have worsened significantly. Uzbekistan's agricultural reform path has diverged from those of most other postsocialist countries, and continuity with the past remains strong. But while rural society in Khorezm may superficially appear static, the local view presented in this book unveils an unexpectedly dynamic situation, characterised by shifts in patronage relations, struggles over legitimacy, and transformations in family structure and community life. Poised between the state, their communities, and an emerging stratum of absentee farm 'sponsors', the new farmers of Khorezm, with their struggle for a place in rural society, are the focus of Trevisani's analysis. What has emerged from decollectivisation in Uzbekistan is a complexly articulated new 'agrarian question' involving new inequalities and conflicts.##

Die Reliefs der Amaravati-Schule. Ein Beitrag zu ihrer Erforschung

Keywords: Amaravati School, museology, stūpas, Buddhist frieze

##The Reliefs of the Amaravati School. A Contribution to their Research

Many Buddhist relief sculptures of the Amaravati School (1st century BCE - 4th century CE; Andhra Pradesh, India) have found their way to museums around the globe, among them the reliefs from the stūpa at Goli. Descriptions of the archaeological finds from the beginning of the 20th century allow us to conclude that most of the reliefs from the site were friezes that were once placed on so-called āyaka projections, positioned at the four cardinal points around the stūpa. The frieze on the east (now in Chennai) depicted the story of Viśvantara; on the south (NY, Metropolitan), the story of Nanda; on the west (Chennai), the stories of Rāhula, Dhanapāla and Ṣaddanta; and on the north (Chennai), the first meal of the future Buddha after austerities and enlightenment. The last frieze shows slightly different stylistic characteristics, the three others being very similar. The same style, including identical decorative patterns, can be seen on a relief in the Musée Guimet, the exact provenance and narrative context of which was hitherto unknown. The fragment belongs to the representation of the Viśvantarajātaka (cf. the description of the drawing at the end of this article). The exceptional possibility of ascertaining the geographical placement of the reliefs demonstrates that the old Buddhist affiliation of protective deities with particular cardinal points was visualized at Goli: The western frieze was flanked by snake deities, the eastern by a vīṇā player, thus corresponding respectively to Virūpakṣa, King of the West and lord of Nāgas, and to Dhṛtarāṣṭra, King of the East and lord of Gandharvas.##

Wanderers between cultures. Ethnicity of German migrants in Australia between hybridity, transculturation, and identity cohesion

Berchem sees migrants as the probably most influential agents of a „globalization from below“. In his cultural-anthropological microstudy based on fieldwork he analyzes fluid lifestyles against a German-Australian societal horizon, and also processual patterns of integration, acculturation and the generation of difference. He has based his empirical insights on interviews, 23 in the explorative phase of fieldwork, and 38 during the problem-oriented phase. The book includes a historical chapter on „ethno-genesis“: German migration from 1788 (German participants in James Cook’s journey) to World War II, followed by the period from 1941 – he distinguishes various periods of the process of culture change, „cultures in transition“, including hybrid forms in the age of globalization. So there are „modifications and new interpretations of cultural practice in the diaspora“ and the „dis-location and re-signification of cultural elements from the original culture in Germany“. The last chapter deals with „dynamics of polylocal interconnections“. The appendix has various materials, like unpublished materials, films, interviews etc.

Towards an understanding of Rongorongo

Keywords: astronomy, navigation, Dietrich, M., graphic systems, script, Barthel, T., Fischer, S., rongorongo

##This article discusses in some detail the hypothesis proposed by Michael Dietrich concerning our understanding of rongorongo. Dietrich argues that ronqoronqo is not a script but a graphic system that contains the celestial knowledge of the prehistoric Oceanic peoples, developed and used for navigation. Dietrich's methodology and conclusions are then compared with those proposed by Thomas Barthel and Steven Fischer as well as with the results of recent research. The implications of Dietrich's hypothesis for Easter Island and Pacific studies and for scientific inquiry in general are discussed, with the purpose of inviting the scientific community to critically review our current knowledge of rongorongo.##

Keywords: illness concepts, witchcraft, sorcery, spirits, health and spirits, ancestor spirits, supernatural illness concepts

Death charms and microbes. Illness concepts on Karkar Island, Papua New Guinea

What is it that produces illnesses? Why do we die? – asks the author. Aim of the study is to analyze concepts of illness among the people of Karkar including socio-cultural contexts and background. While in industrialized countries it is bacteria and viruses which are believed to threaten humans, people in New Guinea feel threatened by witchcraft and ancestor spirits bringing death and disaster. The author, a medical anthropologist and medical doctor analyzes the interplay of western and traditional explanatory models of illness on the island. He combines epidemiological-medical method with the colorful authentic emic views of the inhabitants and thus presents a ‚magical world‘. Herbert found that the belief in black magic has increased in recent times.

Fiction literature as a source for researching identity in anthropology

In this study a new anthropological method utilizing cultural aspects of contemporary needs of identity and related problems in fictional literature is presented. The author combines theories from anthropology, literary studies, psychology, and sociology. Empirical results are drawn from the anthropological analysis of fictional literature from Papua New Guinea, the Solomon Islands, and Vanuatu. The method used for analysis of current needs of identity has been developed by indigenous people in the cities. In this way, „emotional Melanesian knowledge“ on ethnic belonging, relations with the family, sexual relations, friendship is discussed, as well as emotional knowledge on the „threat through foreigners“.

Empathie als moralischer Zwang. Intersubjektivität und nahrungsbezogene Sozialität in Daiden (Papua-Neuguinea)

Intersubjectivity and food-related sociality in Daiden (Papua New Guinea)"

##In this article I analyse the cultural dimensions of empathy ('feeling into others') as configured in Daiden, a Bosmun place in the Madang Province of Papua New Guinea. In order to grasp the Bosmun sense of empathy I explore their ideas on morality, intersubjectivity and the practice of food reciprocity. Compared with other social, human, and experiential phenomena, empathy has been a neglected area of research in anthropology. Indeed, more systematic theoretical approaches combined with detailed ethnographic illustrations have begun to emerge only recently. I take up some of these current findings on empathy and show that in thinking about it from an anthropological perspective, one has to be particularly aware of the prevailing cultural limits as well as permissibility of 'feeling into others' in a given lifeworld. This builds the bridge to the second and empirically grounded part of the article. I argue that Bosmun empathy is expressed via distinct 'foodways' (regular food-related actions and activities), and that it is due to commensality that people feel both permitted and obliged to enquire into each others' lives. To engage in

'good personhood' in Daiden is to engage in 'transparent selfhood' with people one has come to know through relationships of longstanding food reciprocity. People should not only approach others emotionally but let others approach their selves, too. Interestingly, the ideal of mutual transparency includes the expression of negative feelings in public. People who hide negative feelings are said to develop great hatred and are more likely to become suspects of sorcery than people who voice their anger among social consociates, thus allowing others to moderate their negative feelings. Finally I argue that 'relationalism' as grounded in my understanding of a Bosmun relational scheme of living provides a better societal frame for empathy to thrive than 'individualism'.##

Wie weit kann man europäische Einflüsse in der modernen Kunst aus Papua Neuguinea erkennen?

Is there a European influence in Papua New Guinean modern art?

##This article concerns the contemporary art from Papua New Guinea (PNG), in particular painting and drawing. With the founding of art schools in 1969, a modernizing artistic movement was established in PNG, which also coincided with a period of cultural and political change in that country. Soon afterwards, in 1975, Papua New Guinea achieved its political independence. Due to the important Papuan carving tradition, which played a significant role in traditional cultures, and due to the lack of necessary materials for the "arts of paper," this kind of artistic expression was almost nonexistent before 1969. In fact, as this area of art remained unexplored, PNG artists had to invent their own tradition. The main question of this article is where those modern artists drew their stylistic and thematic inspiration from: the local or the European repertoire? ##

Transmigration as lifechoice. Self-images and experiences of commuters between Germany and New Zealand

The topic „Transmigration as lifechoice: ‚Commuter migrants‘ between Germany and New Zealand“ treats the influencing control of transnationalism in areas of everyday life: Lifechoice, biography and identity. Without globalisation as a base for this life choice, life would not be possible in two countries. With the help of this qualitative investigation, I have been able to form a group of transnational commuters or, as I would like to call them, „Commuter migrants“ and analyse this special lifechoice. Commuter migrants have settled down in Germany and New Zealand and live a bi-local lifechoice. The cause for the creation of new lifechoices and migration forms are connected with a change in economic, cultural, political and social processes and the development of transport and communication technologies, all of which is anchored in transnationalism. Transnationalism allows consumption, electoral freedom, information and communication. How strongly transnationalism influences our everyday life, which possibilities, comfort and often unexpected emotional shadows it has, becomes evident in the biographies of „migrating“ Germans and New Zealanders. They use the possibilities which transnationals and offers them. Every one of them is looking after their yearnings for individuality, a certain lifechoice, identity and a constant setting out for change and travel. Commuter migrants fly around the globe to enjoy the summer for half a year at the prevailing other end of the world and create transnational social network. This special form of „global travelers:“ ‚commuter migrants‘– commuters between two worlds“ will be analysed in this book.##

Kiribati. Political and economic change during the protectorate, 1892-1916

From the view of historical science the Pacific area is a still under-researched space. The author opines that the indigenous perspective is lacking in this respect. Existing historiography gives the impression that society there has been static until first westerners came. Taking the case of the Gilbert Islands Werber shows that they underwent continuous change and transformation. But with the advent of Europeans change became different. So the author focuses on structural change in Kiribati in the fields of politics, administration, and economy between 1892 and 1916, the time of the British Protectorate.

Medicinal Plants Used in Hungarian Ethno- and Alternative Veterinary Practices

Keywords: medicinal plants, ethno-veterinary practice, alternative medicine, veterinary phytotherapy, medical anthropology

##According to several surveys there is an ever increasing claim in modern veterinary medicine, organic stock-farming and hobby animal keeping for gentle therapies including the use of medicinal plants, herbal remedies and phytotherapy. This demand is reflected by the fact that since 2001 alternative and organic/ecological veterinary medicine has been included in the curriculum of Hungarian veterinary education, with phytotherapy being one of the leading issues of this novel subject. Ethno-forage and veterinary ethno-medicine are considered as important sources of modern veterinary phytotherapy. Some 60 plant species are utilized by ethno-forage, while at least 150 species are harnessed by veterinary ethnomedicine. More than one third of all the above medicinal plants were or are included in the standardized prescriptions of national formularies (Formulae Normales Veterinariae I-IV) or as active substances in veterinary remedies from herbal origin. The number of currently used fodder supplements and medicinal preparations containing medicinal plants and/or herbal active constituents exceeds 300.##

Trapped between in and out. The post-institutional liminality of ex-prisoners in East Berlin

Keywords: prisoners, deviance, liminality, Turner, V., behavior of prisoners

##Drawing on wide-ranging empirical material collected as a participant observer in East Berlin in 2006 and 2007, the author offers an ethnographic account of ex-prisoners' first weeks months in a rehabilitation programme. The analysis shows that the social boundaries stemming from their long-term imprisonment and from stigmatisation processes developing in the outside society prevent them from fully reintegrating into society. A prisonised habitus continues to shape ex-inmates behaviour; the values and views that were dominant during their imprisonment still orient much of their social interactions. Ex-inmates' relation to space, time and to a free environment is built up anew with the more or less successful help of social workers. The author proposes conceptualising their often frustrating experience as liminal, using Victor Turner's perspective of liminality as a subjective state and therefore as a state that can be perpetuated by ex-inmates trapped between the inside and the outside.##

Neoliberal hegemony. A theoretical explanation

##The European integration process is increasingly being marked by the guidelines of a liberalization program, which make their way not only on a European level, but also on a global one. Taking the European Union's Lisbon strategy and the strategy Europe 2020 as vantage points, we will show how these guidelines are received and interpreted in the framework of the European integration process and are kept relevant for the member states. Global guidelines, semantics and scripts reflected on a European level create a new legitimation context for national actors and - depending on the structure of the national fields involve a change of national legitimation and expectation structures and thus a long-term transformation of governance and societal order. We argue that these developments are not sufficiently understood and explained by traditional research approaches. To arrive at a deeper understanding of this process, we propose a research approach combining John Meyer's world culture theory and Pierre Bourdieu's praxeological field theory.##

Keywords: state-socialist regimes, anthropology in Eastern Europe

The 15 contributions in this volume originated in the conference of the same title in 2008.

The purpose ##was to study these intricate inter-relations between communist dictatorships and the social sciences and to explore the disciplinary developments of ethnography and sociology under communism. The contributions seek to analyze the impact of communist ideology and politics on ethnography and sociology, to discuss the development of scholarly approaches, and also to highlight the representations of society and culture produced by sociologists and ethnographers in this historical context. The presentations and discussions at the conference and the essays gathered in this volume show the significance of this topic for a better understanding not only of sociological and ethnographic traditions in East Central and South East Europe but also of the nature of state-socialist regimes. On the one hand post-1945 sociological and ethnographic research offered valuable empirical insights into the workings of societies under communist rule and their cultural practices. We really do learn something about the ‚people‘ when consulting works that were produced under communism. Thanks to these studies, we learn something about the gap between political intentions and everyday ‚reality‘. On the other hand these texts also tell us something about the dominant visions of an ideal society by the party leaderships and fellow-traveller intellectuals.##

Asymmetrical community. „Integration“ as a blank/empty signifier in the discourse of belonging in Germany and Great Britain

##The article analyses „Integration“ and „Community“, „Cohesion“, in relation to the concept of hegemony as formulated by Laclau and Mouffe. The analysis is based on fragments of discourse from public debates in Germany and the United Kingdom in the first decade of the twenty-first century. Although both states, histories and self-conceptions regarding diversity differ widely, similarities in the discourse and policies of „Integration“ can be perceived. Analytical meanings aside, "Integration" and "Community Cohesion" have become rallying points for several contradictory political projects. They are therefore candidates for the position of "empty signifier" in the discourse of belonging.##

Dynamics and dimensions of the presence of minority place of worship: The Tamil Hindu temple in Basel

The Swiss religious landscape has diversified as a result of immigration and new religious movements. While political debate on religious visibility, e.g. the minaret controversy, obscures the complexity of religious space, this article analyses the place of worship of a relatively unknown group: the Hindu temple community in Basel. By adapting the notion of „presence“ to a multi-dimensional space consisting of geographic, governmental, social, sacred and reticular facets, and by drawing on de Certeau, the analysis better grasps the dynamics between the dimensions out of which the Hindutempel emerges. Tracing how the network has gradually institutionalised, we show how a multidimensional and visible „proper“ is eventually gained: through geographic repositioning and religious investment in chosen places of worship despite the lack of resources says that leads worshippers to get by with little. Using de Certeau's terms, the temple appears as a palimpsest of several spatial dimensions of presence.##

Integration as social construction of the Other in Germany

##The fields of immigration and integration are structured by procedures of inclusion and exclusion, which become manifest in space (proximity and distancing) and time (who comes later, who has to leave again) relations. These are always power relations, establishing specific relations of otherness. Apart from state initiatives and legal framings these procedures also manifest themselves in society. Taking the example of a local neighborhood group caring for refugees in the quarter, this contribution describes the establishing of a relationship between neighbors and refugees which can be called pedagogical. The contribution hints to the fact that this pedagogical relation, as a specific relation of adaption and submission, is characteristic of a benevolent encounter with strangers in Germany.##

Fritzsche reconstructs „the culture“ of female boygroup and girlgroup fans between ten and eighteen years, based on narrative interviews and group discussions. She shows in what way this culture serves as a forum of negotiating normative demands at the threshold between childhood and youth. Empirical work has been done in Germany, probably Berlin (p. 88f.), between 1998 and 2002, the focus being how these young female fans were dealing with, and negotiating sexual and gender meanings. An extensive chapter deals with media consumption, pop culture, being a fan as creative action and in relation to negotiation of norms. The empirical part introduces a number of cases/persons and makes conclusions by way of a comparative analysis. The discussion again deals with the peer groups in question and negotiations of norms.

The de-proletarianization of soccer. On social-structural change in readers of the Kicker magazine between 1954 and 2005

##Since the 1950s, in Germany football has been characterized as a proletarian or working-class sport while in our days football is gaining credence and social acceptability. But how could this decrease of proletarianization—described as a shift of the social focus of football from an especially proletarian to an increased higher social classes interest—be explained? Has the transformation of football which is largely caused by television to an event and show sport made it more attractive for higher social classes (transformation hypothesis) or does the change of the interest in football only explain the similar change of the structure of Germany's social society (similarity hypotheses)? The empirical analysis of the mostly traditional readers of the German Kicker sports magazine as an indicator of the interest in football using the data from Media-Analyse from 1954 to 2005 leads to a clear result: The decrease of proletarianization of the Kicker-readers can only be explained by the socio-structural change in the past fifty years.##

Assimilation and knowledge society. Education-steered integration imperatives in the German discourse of political parties

##The article explores the question, on bases of discourse and content analysis of political documents and parliamentary debates, whether and to what extent the recent conceptions of political parties in Germany on migration and integration politics and policies can be adequately described with the concept of (return of) assimilation. The result is, on the one hand, that integration is indeed increasingly viewed as a one-sided process according to which primarily migrants are expected to make significant efforts for their adaptation. On the other hand, the expectations regarding migrant adaptation are no longer related to a particular and homogenous national German culture, but rather to educational ambitions and labour market-related competencies which are deemed beneficial under conditions of competing nation states in a globalised knowledge-based economy. The dominance of a utilitarian perspective, however, has led to a subordination, or at least qualification of the interests and rights of migrants.##

A new home? An ethnographic study in an old people's home

This is the report of an old people's home, presumably in Germany, in which the author, a social worker who became an anthropologist, has worked for twelve years. It is a critical account of procedures there – of control, tough labor regime and – humanly – inadequate care. Hahn asks in his microstudy whether such a place can become a new „home“, because contradictory cultures (labor necessities, organization, and „inmates“) clash, violating personal rights of the latter, due to requirements of the economization of this „market“. As an anthropologist Hahn describes life in this home from the perspective of inmates, and also those who work there, reflecting his action and also theoretical viewpoints, such as the work of E. Goffman on „total institutions“.

Visiting festivals as a cultural practice shows what is meaningful to participants: creating something apart from everyday life, and common action, and through this, communities emerge for the duration of the event. Kirchner discusses the concept of the festival and the model of festivals in general, and her hermeneutical approach. In a wider context she discusses culture, generating popular culture (such as carnival, and the relation to power, resistance and punishment), psychological contingency coping, liminal experiences (using van Gennep, V. Turner...), and aspects of community.

##New paths of transformation theory? The theoretical debate on the postcommunist transformations after 1998/1999

The article explores the theoretical debates on postcommunist transformations since 1998 with a focus on substantial reorientations and innovations. After identifying important novel or discursively strengthened approaches, three of them are presented and critically discussed in more detail: the post-communism approach, the steering or governance approach, and the Europeanization approach. The examination leads to the result that, indeed, a "second generation" has emerged. It has largely overcome universalistic assumptions and gained explanatory power by more complex theoretical architectures as well as systematic time-space-embeddings or contextualizations. The new generation also demonstrates an intensive exchange with the field of general theories of social change. A final consideration makes the case for interdisciplinary and general theories of societal transformations as a necessary step in the advancement of the theoretical debate.##

##Addresses to the Transnation: Analyzing Public Reactions to the Speeches of Erdoğan and Wulff in Germany

The article explores reactions in public political discourse to recent speeches given by two heads of state in Germany. The speeches by Tayyip Erdoğan (2008) and Christian Wulff (2010) were discussed controversially because both broke with the principle of concordance between a cultural community, their political loyalty, and their place of residence that usually underlies head of state's addresses. While Erdoğan addressed people of Turkish origin as fellow citizens on the territory of the German state, Wulff addressed Muslims living in Germany as being on political and cultural par with the German majority population. We argue that these 'addresses to the transnation' indicate the necessity of an analytical shift from the construction of communities toward the construction of the boundaries between communities as they figure in public discourse.##

Appropriating "die Brasilianerin". Negotiating Belonging and Unbelonging in Everyday Practice in Berlin

Keywords: migration, gender, body/corporeality, belonging, identity

##Within the last twenty-five years, Brazilian migration has constantly grown in number and changed in its profile. Besides its feminization, more and more non-white Brazilian people of underprivileged social strata migrate to Europe, so to Berlin. On the grounds of ethnographic fieldwork, the paper explores negotiations of belonging in everyday practices by emphasizing the role of body-related ascriptions related to the intersectionality of gender and skin color. Special attention is given to forms of mimicry as they are opted - or rejected - by Brazilian women, not just regarding the German norms of behavior but also regarding the existing stereotype of "die Brasilianerin".##

Wie verändert sich die Religiosität im Lebensverlauf? Eine Panelanalyse unter Berücksichtigung von Ost-West-Unterschieden

Keywords: church attendance, religiosity, secularization, age and church attendance, education and religiosity

##How does religiosity change across the life course? A panel analysis considering differences between East and West Germany

Using data from the German Socio-Economic Panel and fixed-effects regression models, this paper examines church attendance rates across the life course. For 1992–2007, the overall frequency of churchgoing shows a slight decrease (secularization). This period effect is continuously thwarted by a positive age effect. However, this positive age effect becomes weaker over the recent years which also might be interpreted as a kind of secularization. In-depth analyses show that, in West Germany, the age-specific increase of church attendance rates is paralleled by gradual increases in the frequency of churchgoing after transition into first marriage, when children reach school-age and after the transition to widowhood. However, reaching a higher educational level and an increase in labor market participation, as well as a first divorce (in West Germany) and the transition into a non-marital cohabitation (in East Germany) contribute to a decrease of religious participation.##

The image of Germany and Jewish self-image of Jews in Germany after 1945. Three generations in comparison

The author asks how Jewish life in Germany after 1945 has developed in comparing three generations, with major focus on the third generation. What has been, and which are, the major elements of Jewish identity in Germany? In using the categories of trauma, generation, memory, and identity he puts three hypotheses forward: First, that Jews in Germany were well-integrated in German society, but kept a mental distance, decreasing from generation to generation; second, each of the three generations developed their own access to the traumatic topic of the Holocaust, depending on the respective zeitgeist; and third, that many sections of the Jewish minority, which before 1933 had not been very traditionally-minded, developed a special appreciation of Jewish tradition after the Holocaust. In the course of fieldwork the author talked with a number of Jews. As to the first hypothesis he found that today, Jews are also well-integrated into the mainstream, but still keep a certain mental distance because of the fear of anti-semitism – which is true for all three generations. Likewise, the second and third hypotheses turned out as expected. Especially the third generation showed a high valuation of their religious and cultural traditions.

Race and culture. Anthropological research by Nazis in occupied Poland during World War II

##During World War II in Cracow, in the occupied Poland, the Nazi authorities established the ideologically oriented "Institut für Deutsche Ostarbeit." The institute comprised several sections, one of them being the „Sektion Rassen- und Volkstumsforschung." The staff of this department undertook racial examinations as well as ethnographic research among the ethnic groups of southern Poland. As a result of this project thousands of anthropological records were collected. After World War II, the collection was taken to the USA but in 2008 it was returned to Poland. Anthropologists from the Jagiellonian University now work on these records, trying to reconstruct the broad context of the Nazi research, including people's memories.##

Park youth in Vienna. A contribution to urban anthropology

Wien: Lit Verlag 2011

216 pp., Euro 29.90; ISBN 3-643-50253-7

Keywords: urban anthropology, migration, youth in parks, parks and youth, Chicago School

Young urbanites in Vienna who spent most of their leisure time in public neighborhood parks come forward in this study. Their daily lives and their fragmented prospects are shown. The book develops a general view on growing up in cities into an in-depth representation of youth. Music as a medium of expression and resistance forms the bass-line of the study. Anthropological fieldwork, youth work backgrounds, and bits from Chicago, London and Paris show a mosaic of coming of age under conditions of global migration and inequality.##

Mayer first presents theoretical aspects in discussing studies of adolescence, and particularly the Chicago School. Furthermore, she uses Victor Turner's notions of liminality and symbolism in her study. She deals with group structures, the body focus (styles, food, health, sex, drugs, music...) as well as „spatial and social contexts“, meaning neighborhoods, the city, jobs/work etc. So she concludes, with Turner, that the park kids are „betwixt and between“ in many respects: „The anthropological study of youth in cities shows how neither of these groups can be explained by their cultural or ethnic backgrounds. It is rather the urban surroundings that lead to these formations under conditions of insecurity and poverty; those from undocumented and labor migration streams are usually involved in the most deprived groupings.“

##Rapid Development of Social and Cultural Anthropology at Zurich in the 70s and 80s

The article describes the beginnings of Social and Cultural Anthropology and "Ethnomedizin" at the University of Zurich in the 70s and 80s within the scope of social conflicts and driven by the huge interest of students in social and cultural issues. Within this dynamic, furthermore, information is provided on the processes of re-orientation and institutionalisation of Social and Cultural Anthropology and on the evolution of a more diversified study program with new courses. Regarding "Ethnomedizin" the stock of literature for building up the new modules and courses is reported and the central issues of these early lectures are analysed and compared. The last section is about a concrete case of applied "Ethnomedizin", the initial obstacles during the field study and the socio-cultural connections playing a key role during illness and health care delivery. A short outlook on institutional aspects concludes this paper.##

##Of coral stones, smart cards, medical information and the Virgin Mary: A German Heilpraktiker and his appropriation of Ayurvedic therapy

In this paper I address the question of appropriation by examining the diversity of medical practices in Germany by looking at their institutions of the Kur and the Heilpraktiker and their panoply of therapeutic practices. I do this by describing the poly-therapeutics of a Heilpraktiker in an Ayurvedic spa in an attempt to argue that the panoply, housed in a single person, produces a mangled medical episteme that befuddles any clear distinction between "source" and "recipient" traditions, or in this context between medicine and alternative medicine. I then attempt to offer an explanation at several levels for this epistemic and cultural mangling by discussing a) through a local register, the German institution of the Heilpraktiker within the larger context of the German health care system in terms of its legal, economic and pedagogic structures; and b) through a global register and the practice of biomedicine, to argue that the panoply is partly the sign of an epistemic impasse at the heart of biomedicine. This impasse summons of both practitioners and patients the panoply, leading them to borrow, steal, adapt, appropriate or expropriate from several spheres - such as religion, rocket science, or astrology - in an attempt to make the panoply not merely a "complete and impressive collection of things" against adversary but a necessary therapeutic armoury that resonates with its older meaning of being a "complete spiritual armoury for warfare against the Adversary" (cf. the Panoply of God, Ephesians, 6:13).##

Folk culture – otherness in selfhood. Blueprints of rural culture around 1900

Naumann analyzes the time around 1900 when depictions of folk life were frequent in bourgeois texts and pictures. The author asks whether this trend may be understood as a reaction to modernization experiences in bourgeois everyday life. She takes her material from pictures of rural life, illustrations in books, postcards, and texts from Folklore Studies. Using a symbol-theoretical and psychanalytical framework she shows that consciously keeping one's distance from technical and civilizational achievements apparent in these pictures at first glance, is merely a cultural surface impression. She finds that behind that façade there are practices safeguarding one's own existence and embracing modernization. In this way, Naumann argues, she goes beyond ideology-critical and discourse-analytical interpretations which characterize such images and texts as escapist and compensatory cultural forms.

Intoxicated communitas. A study on Rhineland carnival

Intoxicated communities are momentary, excess-oriented forms of community. This book shows that they are the basic figure, or pattern, of social living together and that they can be effective as a social bond. The author presents this in the case of Rhineland carnival. This ethnographic explorative study describes carnival as an opportunity to annul laws of everyday life and to experience exceptionality, beyond everyday life. The fifth season of the year, carnival, allows an alternative reality to emerge and intense feelings of community. This passing „anti-structural“ state along the Rhine river does not endanger the societal order, however, but underlines its necessity. Tumultuous scenes can be seen in the streets, dance and song in overcrowded pubs, singing and dancing fans, etc. Niekrenz first describes the process of community formation using dimensions of space, time, and body. The phenomenon of intoxication is likewise described, focusing collective intoxication, and then community/communitas and intoxication. The history of the Rhineland carnival is presented, methods (including participant observation), followed by the study itself, again using space, time and body as ordering devices. The last chapter draws conclusions, and touches aspects of gender differences, mediatization and transnationalization.

Oversexed and underfucked. On the societal construction of lust

The author presents this topic dealing with contemporary western societies; it is framed in the sociology of knowledge. The title alludes to a provocative diagnosis of present conditions of lust and sexual longing, claiming that lust between the sexes has largely been ‚lost‘, and that oversexualization as presented in the media is a major cause of this present state of affairs. The author also implies that ‚we‘ all want to know what good sex is. Based on these premises she analyzes the topic – ideas of a ‚positive‘ sexuality according to scientists and the numerous ‚receipes‘ for a good sex life according to guide books from the 1950s until today. From these sources the author reconstructs ‚sexual scripts‘ (Sleeping Beauty script; Ken&Barbie script; Adam&Eve script; I&I script). All of these show a typical line of development, moving from cohabitation as drama in the Sleeping Beauty script to masturbation stage-setted as porncast in the I&I script. Thus, the notion of ‚underfucked‘ does not point to a lack of cohabitation but instead its continuing ‚social death‘.

„The body is there, but not the soul“ On the function of antisemitic statements in male construction of four Berlin youths with Turk and Arabic migratory background

In the debate around a „new“ anti-Semitism in Germany the focus is on young men with so-called Muslim migration background. The author has conducted qualitative interviews with Berlin youths regarding the form and function of such ascriptions for their male identity construction. In doing so she particularly focused on the intersections of various categories such as gender, origin, class, and nationality. The intersectional analysis allows to break up the stigmatizing view of the „Muslim man“ and also to understand anti-Semitism in a broader connection of integration politics and racism. She concludes that in analyzing and describing anti-semitic statements one has to consider the specific social situation in migrating and difficulties of the young men to be recognized. She found that anti-semitic statements can be considered to be a constitutive element of masculine performance, from which follow new ways of problematizing and fighting them. Images of Jews are obviously connected with imaginings of honor among Muslim youths, and obviously ascriptions of strengths of Jews point to their lack among Muslim youths.

Religion and religiosity in united Germany. Twenty years after the change

This book is based on a conference of the Sociology of Religion section of the German Society of Sociology at Leipzig, 2009. The editors focused on including both empirically founded and theoretical contributions, and both quantitative and qualitative approaches. Ten years after unification there was – against expectations – no remarkable increase in religious activity in East Germany. The authors ask whether this situation has changed meanwhile.

The concept of the total institution could be understood to suggest that prisons work like frictionless machines. However, research has long shown that prison life is ambiguous and often less clearly defined than one would expect. We present findings from a project (BiSt) which was initiated in 2007 to improve basic education in the Swiss prison system. We build our account around a notion of fissure voiced by inmates: the idea that the educational unit is like an island (of normality) within the restricted and restrictive world of the prison.##

The article deals with Afro-Cuban Santería in Germany and its religious practices developed under diaspora conditions. The aim is to demonstrate that Cuban priests and their multinational following represent a notion of religious space that differs from most of the established religious denominations in Germany. Instead of temples and localized sanctuaries Santería devotees explore and redefine natural and urban spaces relating them to specific deities of the Oricha pantheon in order to make ritual use of them. Since ritual uses of public spaces is uncommon in the host country it provokes misunderstanding or incomprehension as the article demonstrates by means of several empirical examples.##

The articles presented here focus on the ways and strategies of migrants, on „irregular migration“ in and to, as well as on „transit migration“ through the region, while others deal with the effects of return migration on Balkan societies. They present empirical findings on migration which are of interest not only for experts on Southeast Europe and on migration processes in general, but also for those interested in European integration and in the consequences of EU migration policies.##

Transnationality as a resource? Networks of Vietnamese migrants between Berlin and Vietnam

Considering transnationality as a resource among actors in the social space between Vietnam and Berlin Schmiz lends them a voice and describes their lives and economic activities from the perspective of geography, although the the micro-focus is on persons and ethnography. The theoretical framework is transnationalism, migrant economies (middlemen, ethnic ownership, ethnic controlled economy etc.), and migration and development. The author explains her case, Vietnamese workers in the former German Democratic Republic and methodological aspects which includes participant observation but also rather ‚sociological‘ tools such as forms of interviews. The sample of migrants is presented – types of merchants, employees, and service personnel, the Vietnamese entrepreneurs in Berlin, and the generation of a transnational field of agency. Then, empirical results are discussed against theoretical background, and transnationality as a resource is considered.

Meals. Old burden or new enjoyment?

The authors in the book report on – mainly German – changing food and eating habits, old and new trends. This „slow trend“ leads to an increasing abandonment of classical customs of the family eating together, which is replaced by snacks taken according to convenience and possibility, not at fixed timings. Thus, time and dining rhythms change. But still, the ideal continues to be the nicely decorated table and families still meet to dine, and colleagues meet at noontime to eat. The authors ask whether dining can be seen as an old, conventionalist burden, or whether it can become a new kind of enjoyment. The papers define, analyze and discuss various perspectives of a changing everyday practice.

##They sow the wind and reap the whirlwind. An empirical theory comparison of explanatory mechanisms in the cycle of violence

The present study deals with the theoretical and empirical analysis of the intergenerational transmission of violence. Within the framework of a systematic theory comparison, the self-control theory (Gottfredson und Hirschi 1990) and the social learning theory (Bandura 1979a, b) are used to analyze the mechanisms relating the experience of parental violence in childhood to the use of violence in adolescence (the so-called cycle of violence). The analyses are based on a survey of ninth-graders from schools in Dortmund and Stuttgart (n=4583) conducted by the Criminological Research Institute of Lower Saxony (KFN) in 2005. Data analyses are carried out based on linear structural equation modeling. The results reveal that both self-control and social learning processes mediate between the experience of violent parenting and the prevalence of juvenile violence; however, a greater relative share of the cycle of violence can be traced back to social learning processes. The systematic theory comparison points out that the social learning theory provides the superior explanation of the cycle of violence. The results of the study are discussed with regard to their implications for further theory development.##

Since 2007, the German Residence Act in certain cases provides for the sanctioning of a lack of integration by expulsion. Based on a coherent phase of (media)events in April 2006, this article examines which understanding of integration shaped the discourse of expulsion in recent German history. By talking about expulsions a focus is set on the non-integration or the alleged refusal of integration. In the German discourse of expulsion the notion of an ‚integrated‘ German society is produced, from which the ‚non-integrated Other‘ can or should be expelled.##

Muslim adolescence? The meaning of Muslim religiosity among young migrants. Biographical case studies

Tressat discusses and compares Muslim immigration to France and Germany: history, juridical questions, debates on Muslim immigration, then studies on Muslim religious studies in the context of migration, adolescence and religiosity against theoretical backgrounds of ‚reflexive modernity‘. This is followed by analytical questions such as theories on adolescence, functional and structural views of religiosity, the ‚modernized‘ phase of Islamic youth and the position of obedience in the historical development of Islam. Considering the latter and norms and values Tressat asks whether there are signs of a Muslim adolescence. The four in-depth case studies (two men, two women) follow the theoretical stances explained before. Comparing the cases Tressat concludes that religion and religiosity do not represent particularly important topics, and that predominant drives in these lives are rather to be successful and lead a meaningful life, and creative-reflexive and pragmatic-functional patterns of meaning are identified.

Il santo emigrato. Ritual and social change among Sicilian migrants in Germany

The author shows how ritual revitalization in migration as a cultural reserve between resistance and eclipsing has the potential to diminish the cultural impact of the migration crisis. In combining old and new this revitalization fits in between adaptation to new conditions of the receiving society and resistance of anachronistic practices against these adaptation processes. Having a forerunner in Christian Giordano, Valentin likewise investigates in Mirabella and Sindelfingen as locations of his research. While he conducted participant observation in Sindelfingen 2003-6, he only visited Mirabella Imbaccari in eastern Sicily briefly, concentrating on immigrants and their descendents in Sindelfingen. He portrays the history of guest workers' migration from Mirabella, ritual/religious aspects such as that of St. Joseph in Sicily and in Catholicism, then this festival at Sindelfingen, and popular aspects of this ritual complex, as well as interaction and reactions of the ecclesiastical side.

Mediumistic healing in Germany. An ethnography

This is a „writing culture-informed“, narrative account of the author's fieldwork among several movements of healing in Germany: shamanism-related groups and persons, media, Reiki, and the healer Bruno Gröning. Accordingly, Voss's understanding of culture is that of a heterogeneous, moving and open one without clear boundaries. Voss started from the puzzlement about „invisible spirit beings“ in a highly technological society – the fact that many people do not adhere to the „official canon of their culture“. He thus frames his research as „culture as collage“, using the multi-sited approach to follow his topics and meet people. Theoretically he explores such phenomena by discussing charisma, mostly with Michael Harner and Thomas Hauschild, and to a lesser degree with Max Weber, and applies this to events in Germany like the Dalai Lama, Bruno Gröning, or Reiki healing. The classical ethnological theme of shamanism is likewise theorized based on well-known authors and related to his ethnographic material. Often, Voss starts from grass-roots and everyday situations, such as contacting a shaman from a small ad in a local paper, contacts and seminars with the Foundation for Shamanic Studies, and describing in detail how the story continues, that is, on a very personal level also. Another framing of the book is to explain alterity – or the paradoxon of seemingly incompatible practices of a mediumistic kind in a highly „technological culture“ – with the philosopher Bernhard Waldenfels (his phenomenology of the Other): that experience would become foreign, and that self and other emerge from a continuous process of simultaneous in- and exclusion – and cannot be separated.

##Feminine immigrants in domestic work: domestic training courses in a Catholic parish in Madrid

In Spain, domestic workers in the informal sector are often recruited and placed in Spanish households by local institutions such as NGOs. One of the central and biggest institutions which recruit female immigrants for formal as well as informal domestic work is the Catholic Church. It acts as a mediator for domestic workers especially in its own parishes within the scope of social work called "Caritas parroquial". Beforehand, the immigrants are often trained to be domestic workers. The topic of this paper is one of these training courses for domestic workers including the later procurement of a job, which was studied during one year field research in Madrid. It is based on participant observation as well as interviews with migrants, instructors and Church officials. The article starts with an analysis of current domestic work in the context of the global financial crisis. Afterwards a short account of the training course in a Catholic parish is given; domestic work and the role of the Spanish Catholic Church in it are outlined and subsequently, the assumptions of the interactions in the domestic service course, the construction of otherness and of migrant domestic workers are analysed, and finally these interactions are explained within different power structures.##

Smugglers' society. Informal economies at the eastern border of the European Union. An ethnography

On the periphery of the European Union, the border between Poland and Russia, a specific form of market economy has emerged. The author has lived there for a year and shows the embeddedness of this informal economy in everyday life. His aim is to show everyday life in this region and the connectedness with the systemic level of societal framing conditions – and the partly disastrous effects of political action for individuals. The first chapter introduces historical and general ethnographic aspects of smuggling, followed by describing the location of research which is located in Sepopol, near Kaliningrad. From this setting, a typology of smuggling is developed – the actors, and also reactions of the population: the position of the local elite regarding smuggling, and representations of smuggling in the population, which includes the „social vulnerability“ of smugglers. Finally, Wagner, following Bourdieu, „objectifies the subjective“ – as a methodological excursus, describing the fieldworker as a flaneur, as a „close foreigner“, and subjectivity in the method of ethnography.

Epistemic locations. Community and region as formats of research

Community studies and area studies are internationally widespread areas of research. Frequently they did not represent pure research but have been applied kinds of knowledge. The papers ask how current projects of community and regional research do justice to global influence making itself felt in local contexts.

Recognition and Validation of the Traditional Herbal Pharmacopoeias of the French overseas Departments and Territories: Scientific and Regulatory Aspects

Keywords: traditional pharmacopoeia, national pharmacopoeia, regulation of pharmacopoeia, pharmacopoeia, medical anthropology

##The French regulation for herbal medicines defines 439 traditionally used medicinal plants for allopathic therapeutic use. These herbal drugs are registered and figure in the French National Pharmacopoeia as part of the French pharmaceutical monopoly, with the exception of some of them which can be sold outside of the pharmacies. The majority of these plants are native to Europe. Nevertheless, in the French overseas departments and territories, exist strong popular medical practices, based on the use of local medicinal plants. Only a few of these medicinal species can be found in the French or European Pharmacopoeia. The possibility for these species to appear in the French pharmacopoeia would be a recognition of the cultural traditions of these communities. Furthermore, these herbal drugs could benefit from the new European traditional herbal medicines registration procedure, which applies in all European countries. Recently, the French Medicinal Products Regulatory Agency (AFSSAPS) evaluated the safety and efficacy of two Caribbean herbal drugs, Lippia alba N.E.Br. (Verbenaceae), leaf, and Senna alata L. (Fabaceae), leaf, used traditionally in Martinique and Guadeloupe for digestive and skin ailments, respectively. Consequently, these two drugs were integrated to the list of medicinal plants of the French Pharmacopoeia in 2005. Furthermore, analytical monographs of these two herbal drugs were drawn and adopted by the French Pharmacopoeia Commission. The registration by AFSSAPS of others medicinal species from French overseas territories is envisaged in a near future.##

Cultural contrasts in Dublin. A montage of ethnographic studies

(Lines. Beiträge zur Stadtforschung aus dem Institut für Ethnologie der Universität Hamburg 6)

Wien: Lit Verlag 2011

Keywords: urban anthropology, paganism, diaspora, Hinduism

##Up to the 1990s, Dublin and Irish urban cultures had only been marginally studied by cultural and social anthropologists, even though the Greater Dublin Area has been home to almost one third of the Republic's population for several decades. From this time anthropologists slowly became aware of the variety of cultural groups and topics which shape Ireland's capital. This growing awareness went hand in hand with the major economic, architectural, social and cultural changes which Dublin was experiencing. Sparked by Ireland's membership of the EU (then EEC) and accelerated by the Celtic Tiger economy and increasing numbers of immigrants, the city has turned into a multicultural space of a variety unprecedented before. The articles in this book are based on a student research project in Dublin in 2006, presenting four ethnographic case studies ranging from immigration and the formation of new religious groups to survival strategies of the urban homeless.##
